PORPHYRION

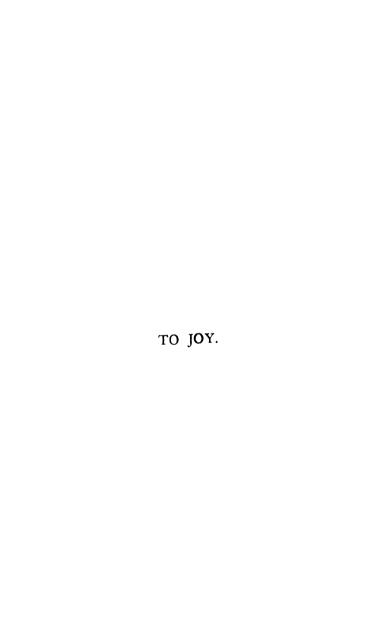

AND OTHER POEMS.

PORPHYRION

AND OTHER POEMS BY LAURENCE BINYON

LONDON GRANT RICHARDS 1898

For the design on the cover of this volume I am indebted to Mr. William Strang.—L. B.

CONTENTS.

Porphyrion
London Visions:
The Fire 63
Martha 66
The Dray 74
Eleonora Duse as Magda 75
'Midsummer Noon 77
The Paralytic
Songs of the World Unborn
THE SUPPER
VARIOUS POEMS:
The Renewal
February Morning
Song '
" May Evening
Love Infinite
Over the Sea
Lament
Separation
Fears of Love
In the Fireligat
The Elm
The Vision of Augustine and Monica 130
The Pine Woods of Grijó
Carvalhos
Deuro
Natu_c
NOTES

PORPHYRION:

A POEM, IN FIVE BOOKS.

ARGUMENT.

A young man of Antioch, flying from the world, in that enthusiasm for the assetic life which fascinated early Christendom, dwells some years a hermit in the Syrian desert; till, by an apparition of magical loveliness, his life is broken up, and his nature changed: returning to the world, he embraces every vicissitude, hoping to find again the lost vision of that ideal beauty.

For the story on which this poem is founded, see the notes at the end of the book.

PORPHYRION.

BOOK I.

O FROM the dungeon of this flesh to break
At iast, and to have peace, Porphyrion cried,
Inly tormented, as with pain he toiled
Before his dwelling in the Syrian noon:
The desert, idly echoing, answered him.
Had not the desert peace? All empty stood
That region, the swept mansion of the wind.
Pillars of skiey rock encompassed it
Afar; there was no voice, nor any sound
Of living creature, but from morn to eve
Silence abounding, that o'erflowed the air
And the waste sunshine, and on stone and herb
The tinge and odour of neglected time.

Yet into vacancy the troubled heart Brings its own fullness: and Porphyrion found The void a prison, and in the silence chains.

He in the unripe fervour of sweet youth whearing a prophet's cry, had fled from mirth And revel to assuaging solitude.

He turned from soft entreaties, he unwound The arms that would have stayed him, he denied His friends, and cast the garland from his brow. Pangs of diviner hunger urged him forth Into the wild: for ever there to lose Love, hate, and wrath, and fleshly tyrannies, And madness of desire: tumultuous life, Full of sweet peril, thronged with rich alarms, Dismayed his soul, too suddenly revealed: And far into the wilderness, from face And feet of men he fled, by memory fierce Pursued; till in the impenetrable hills He deemed at last to have discovered peace. Three years amid the wilderness he dwelt, In solitary, pure aspiring turned Toward the immortal Light, that all the stars Outshines, and the frail shadow of our death Consumes for ever, and sustains the sun. The voiceless days in pious order flowed, Calm as the gliding shadow of a cloud On Lebanon: morn followed after morn Like the still coming of a stream: his mind Was habited in silence, like a robe.

Then gradually mutinous, quenched youth Swelled up again within him, hard to tame. For like that secret Asian wave, that drinks The ever-running rivers, and holds all In jealous wells; so had the desert drunk All his young thoughts, wishes, and idle tears. Nor any sigh returned; but in his breast

Sweet yearnings, and the thousand needs that live Upon the touch of others, impulses Quick as dim buds are to the rain and light, Falterings, and leanings backward after joy, And dewy flowerings in the heart, that make Life fragrant, were all sealed and frozen up. Now, at calm evening, the just-waving boughs Of the lone tree began to trouble him: Almost he had arisen, following swift As after beckoning hands. Now every dawn At once disrobed him of tranquillity: Fever had taken him; and he was wrought Into perpetual strangeness, visited By rumours and bright hauntings from the world. And now the noon intolerable grew: The very rock, hanging about him, seemed To listen for his footfall, and the stream Commented, whispering to the rushes. Ah, The little lizard, blinking in the sun, Was spying on his soul! A terror ran Into his veins, and he cried out aloud, And heard his own voice ringing in the air, A sound to start at, echoing fearfully. He paced with fingers clenched, with knotted brow: He cast himself upon the ground, to feel His wild breast nearer the impassive earth, So far away in peace, but all in vain! And springing up he cast swift eyes around Like a sore-hunted creature that must seek A path to fly: alas, from his own thoughts

What outer wilderness shall harbour him? Then after many idle purposes, And such vain wringing of the hands, as use Men slowly overtaken by despair, He sought in toil, last refuge, to forget: And he began to labour at the plot. Before his rocky cell, digging the soil With patience, and the sweat was on his brow. All the lone day he toiled, until at last He rested heavy on the spade, and bowed His head upon his hands: a shadow lay Beneath him, and deep silence all around. The silence seized him. As a man who feels Some eye upon him unperceived, he turned His head in fear: and lo, a little sound Among the reeds, like laughter, mocked at him. And he discerned bright eyes in ambush hid Beyond the bushes; and he heard distinct A song, borne to him with the clapping hands Of banqueters; an old song heard afresh, That melted quivering in his heart, and woke Delicious memory: all his senses hung. To listen when that voice sang to his soul: Then, fearfully aware, he shuddered back: Yet could not shake the music from his ears. He cast the spade down, with quick-beating heart, And sought that voice, whence came it; but the reeds In the soft-running stream were motionless, The bushes vacant, all the valley dumb: O And clear upon the yellowed region burned

Evening serene. Then his fore troubled heart With a tumultuous surging in his breast Heaved to the calm heaven in a bitter cry: I have no strength, I have no refuge more. Father, ere thou forsake me, send me peace!

Scarce had the sun into his furnace drawn The western hills, whose molten peaks shot far Over the wide waste region fiery rays, When swiftly Night descended with her stars: And lo, upon this wrought, unhappy spirit At last out of the darkness, raining mild In precious dew upon the desert, peace Incredibly descended with the night. He stood immersed in the sweet falling hush. Over him liquid gloom quivered with stars Appearing endlessly, as each its place Remembered, and in order tranquil shone. Easily all his fever was allayed: And as a traveller strained against a storm That meets him, buffeting the mountain side, Suddenly entering a deep hollow, finds Magical ease over his nerves, and thinks He never tasted stillness till that hour; So eager he surrendered and relaxed His will, persuaded sweetly beyond hope.

Tranquil at last, his solitary cell
He entered, and a taper lit, that shed
Upon rude arches and deep-shadowed walls

A clearness, tempering all'with gentle beam. Then he, that with such anguish of desire Had supplicated peace, now peace was come, Of all forgetful save of his strange joy, That dear guest in his bosom entertained; From trouble and from the stealing steps of time Sequestered: housed within a blissful mood Of contemplation, like a sacred shrine; And poured his soul out, into gratitude Released: how long, there was no tongue to tell, Nor was himself aware; no warning voice Admonished, and the great stars altered heaven Unnoted, and the hours moved over him, When on his ear and slowly into his soul-Deliciously distilling, stole a sigh. O like the blossoming of peace it seemed, Or like an odour heard: or as the air Had mirrored his own yearning joy in speech, A whisper wandering out of Paradise. Porphyrion, Porphyrion! Like a wind Shaking a tree, that whisper shook his heart. Keen to reality enkindled now His inmost fibre was aware of all: Vast night and the unpeopled wilderness Around him silent; in that solitude Himself, and near to him a human sigh!

Immediately the faint voice called again: Thou only in this perilous wilderness Hast found a refuge; ah, for pity's sake Open! It is a woman weak and lost ? In this great darkness, that importunes thee.

Then with a beating heart, Porphyrion spoke. O woman, I have made my soul a vow To look upon a human face no more.

Yet in some corner might I rest my limbs That are so weary with much wandering, And thou be unhurt by the sight of me!

Sweet was the voice: doubting, he answered slow. Thou troublest me. I know not who thou art
That com'st so strangely, and I fear thy voice.
What wouldst thou with me? Enter: but my face
Seek not so meet.

Then he unclosed the door,
But turned aside, and knelt apart, and strove
Again to enter the sweet house of peace.
Yet his heart listened, as with hurried feet
The woman entered; and he heard her sigh,
Like one that after peril breathes secure.
Now the more fixedly he prayed; his will
Was fervent to be lost in holy calm,
So hardly new-recovered: but his ear
Yearned for each gentle human sound, the stir
Of garments, moving hand or heaving breast.
Amid his prayer he questioned, who is this
That wanders in this wilderness alone?
And, as he thought, the faint voice came to him:

I hunger.

Then, as men do in a dream, Obeying without will, he sought and found Food from his store, and brought, and gave to her. But as he gave, he touched her on the hand: He looked at unawares, then turned away; And dared with venturing eyes to look again; And when he had looked, he could not look elsewhere. O what an unknown sweetness troubled him! He gazed: and as wine blushes through a cup Of water slowly, in sure-winding coils Of crimson, the pale solitude of his soul Was filled and flushed, and he was born anew. Instantly he forgot all his despair And anguished supplications after peace. Not peace, but to be filled with this strange joy He pined for, while that lovely miracle His eyes possessed, nor wonder wanted more. At last his breast heaved, and he found a voice.

Mystery, speak! O once again refresh
My famished ear with thy sweet syllables!
Thou comest from the desert night, all bloom!
I fear to look away, lest thou shouldst fade.
Art thou too moulded out of simple earth
As I, or only visitest my sight,
Deluding? Ah, Delusion, breathe again
The music of thy voice into my soul!

As if a rose had sprung within his cell

And magically opened odorous leaves, So felt he, as she raised her eyes on him And spoke.

Hast thou forgotten then so soon? Hast thou not vowed never again to look
On face of woman or of man? Remember
Ere it be lost, thy vow, thy treasured vow.
O turn away thy wonder-wounded eyes,
Call back thy rashly wandering looks, unsay
Thy words, and this frail image from thy breast
Lock harshly out! Defend thy soul with prayers,
Nor hazard for a dream thy holy calm;
Lest thou repent, and this joy shatter thee.

While thus she spoke, the stirring of her soul, Even as a breeze is seen upon a pool, Appeared upon her face. Like the pale flower Of darkness, the sweet moon, that dazzles first And then delights, unfolding more and more Her beauty, shining full of histories On the dark world, upon Porphyrion now She shone; and he was lifted into air Such as immortals breathe, who dwell in light Of memory beginningless, and hope Endless, and joy old and forever fresh. He heard, yet heard not, and still gazing, sighed:

Pour on, delicious Music, in my ears Thy sweetness: for I parch, I am athirst. Three years have I been vacant of all joy, Have mocked my sense with famine, and the sound Of wind and reed: but in thy voice is bliss. How am I changed, since I have looked on thee! Thou art not dream. Yet, if a vision only, Tell me not yet, suffer me still to brim My sight to overflowing, to rejoice My heart to melting, even to despair. Thou art not dream! Yet tell me what thou art, That in this desert venturest so deep?

Seek not, she answered, what I am, nor whence I come; in destiny, perhaps, my hand Was strutched toward thee, and my way prepared. Only rejoice that thou didst not refuse Help to the helpless, and hast succoured me.

As the awakened earth beholds the sun,
Her saviour, when his beam delivers her
From icy prison, and that annual fcar
Of death, Porphyrion in his bosom felt
Pangs of recovered ecstasy, old thoughts
Made young, and sweet desires bursting his heart
Like the fresh bursting of a thousand leaves.
Uplifted into rapture he exclaimed:

O full of bliss, out of the empty world That comest wondrous, I will ask no more. Enough that thou art here, that I behold Thy face, and in thee mirrored all the world Created newly: Eyes, my oracles, What days, what years of wonder ye foretell! As in a dewdrop all the morning shines I see in you time glorious, grief refreshed, And Fate undone.

Seest thou only this? She said, and earnestly regarded him: Art thou so eager after joy? Yet think In what a boundless wilderness of time We wander brief! Art thou so swift to taste Of thy mortality? Yet I am come To bring thee tidings out of every sea: Not pearls alone, but shipwrecks in the night Unsuccoured, and disastrous luring fires, And tossings infinite, and peril strange. O wilt thou dare embark? Dost thou not dread This ocean, in whose murmur seems delight? Will even thy hunger drive thee through the waves To bliss? I look on thee, and see the joy Rise up within thy bosom, and I fear. So fragile is this sweetness, and so vast The world: O venturous, glad voyager, Be sure of all thy courage, for I see Far off the cloud of sorrow, and bright spears, And dirges, and joy changed from what it seemed. Art thou still fervent, O impetuous one? Still hastest thou to fly tranquillity?

But he on whom she looked with those deep eyes Of bright compassion, answered undismayed:

Let me drink deep of this fountain of bliss!

Speak not of mortal fear, speak not of pain: Thou painest, but with joy. Thou art all joy; And in the world I have no joy but thee. O that I had the wasted days once more Since to this idle, barren wilderness I fled, in fear of the tumultuous world, Enamoured of the silence: here I dreamed In lonely prayer to satiate my soul. But now, I want. Rain on my thirsty heart Thy charm, and by so much as was my loss By so much more enrich me. I have stript My days, imprisoned wandering desires, Made of my mind a jealous solitude, Pruned overrunning thoughts, and rooted up Delight and the vain weeds of memory, Imagining far off to capture peace. Blind fool! But O no, let me rather praise Foreseeing Fate, that kept so fast a watch Over my bliss, and of my heart prepared A wilderness to bloom with only thee!

Even now he would embrace her; but awhile She with delaying gesture stayed him still, Wistfully doubting, and perusing well His inmost gaze and his adoring heart.

As from bright water on some early morn, Under a beautiful dim-branching tree, A gleam floats up among the leaves, and ser ds Light into darkness wavering: from the light Of his enraptured face a radiance shone 'Into the mystery of her eyes; at last To his warm being she resigned her soul. She on his heart inscribed for evermore Her look in that deep moment, and her love. At unawares this trembled from her lips:

O joyful spirit, I too have need of thee!
And now he seemed to fold her in his arms,
And on the mouth to kiss her; close to him,
Surely her swimming eyes were dim with love,
Her lips against him murmured tenderly,
And her cheek touched his own: yet even now,
Even as her bosom swelled within his arms,
As like the inmost richness of a rose
Wounding, the perfume of her soul breathed up
An insupportable joy into his brain,
Even now, alas! faltering in ecstasy,
His arms were emptied; back he sank; despair
Drowned him; upon his sense the darkness closed;
And with a cry, lost in a cloud, he fell.

BOOK II.

SLUMBER these desolated senses guard With silence interposed and dimness kind; While in tumultuous ebb joy and dismay Murmur, re-gathering their surge afar. Idle thou liest, Porphyrion, and o'erthrown By violent bliss into a trance as deep: Yet even in thy trance thou takest vows, Thou burnest with a dedicated fire, And thou canst be no more what thou hast been. A rebel, thou wert in strong bonds, who now Art chosen and consenting: and prepared Is all thy path, that no more leads to peace, But to repining fever; pain so dear, It will not be assuaged. Awaiting thee Is all that Love of the deep heart requires; The ecstasy, the loss, the hope, the want, The prick of grief beneath the closed eyelid Of him whom memory visits, but not rest; The sweetness touched, for ever perishing Out of the eager hands. Invisibly Perhaps even now on thy unconscious cheek Thy Guids is gazing, and to pity moved He thy forgetful term gently extends.

At last from heavily unclouding sleep
Porphyrion stirs: dimly over his brain
Returns the noon, and opens wide his eyes.
Some moments by the veiling sense of use
Delayed in wonder, troubled he starts up.
Instantly he remembered; and all changed
Appeared his cell, the silence and the light:
She, whom his heart had need of, was not there.
And eager from his dwelling he came forth,
If there were sign of her. But all was still.

Suspended over the forsaken land, The sun stood motionless, and palsied Time, Helpless to urge his congregated hours, Leaned heavy on the mountain: the steep noon Had all the cool shade into fire devoured. Then quailed Porphyrion. Lost was his new joy, An apparition frail as a bright flame Seen in the sun: irrevocably lost The old thoughts that so long had sheltered him. The fear, that presaging the heavy world Makes wail the newborn child, he now, a man, Thrice competent to suffer, felt afresh, To cruel truth re-born, a naked soul. Now he had eyes to see and ears to hear, And knew at last he was alone': the sky Absorbed he saw, the earth with absent face, The water murmuring only to the reeds, Unconscious rock, and sun-contented sand. And even as within him keener rose

Longing unloosed, so much the heavier grew The intensity of solitude around.

Melancholy had planned her palace here. Dead columns, to support the burning sky, For living senses insupportable, She made, and ample barrenness, wherein To ponder of defeated spirits, quenched Desire, o'ertaken hope, courage undone, Implored oblivion, and rejected joy: Nor this alone, but idleness so vast As even the stormiest enterprise becalmed. Till it was trivial to advance one foot Beyond the other; rashness to provoke An echo, where if ever man could laugh, Laughter had seemed the end of vanity, Were not a vanity more vain in tears. For from the blown dust to the extremest hills, Audible silence, that sustained despair, A ceiling over all immovable, Presided; and the desert, nourishing " That silence, listened, jealous of a sound Younger than her unageing solitude; The desert, that was old when earth was young.

Wailing into the silence, that rang back A wounded cry, to the unhearkening ear Of the austere ravines perhaps not strange, The youth in that vain region stood, and cast Hither and thither seeking, his sad eyes. Out of the dreadful light to his dim cell He fled for refuge. Here he had possessed Joy, for a brief space, here She looked on him, Here had her heart beat in her bosom close Against his own. Her voice was in his ear; And suddenly his soul was quieted.

Surely the visitation of such spirits

Comes not of chance, he murmured, but of truth.

Surely this was the shadow of some light

That shines, the odour of some flower that blooms,

And far off mid the great world dwells in flesh

That blissful spirit, and bears a human name.

If she be far, yet have I all my days

For seeking, and no other joy on earth:

I will arise, and seek her through the world.

With this resolve impassioned and inspired,
His thoughts were bright, and his hot bosom calmed.
Sweet was it to behold that radiant goal,
Though far, and hazardous and wide the way.
The greatness of his quest found answer in him
Of greatness, and the thousand teasing cares
That swarm upon perplexity, flew off.
Gladly against his journey he prepared
His pilgrim's need, and laid him down and slept,
And ere the dawn with scrip and staff arose.

Now at his door, irrevocably free, Before the unknown world, spread dim and vast, He stood and pondered, gazing forth, which way To follow, and what distant city or vale Held his desire; but pondering he was drawn Forth by some secret impulse; he obeyed, Not doubting; toward the places of his youth He turned his face, toward the high mountain slopes Of the dim west, and Antioch and the sea. Up the long valley, by the glimmering stream He went; and over him the stars grew pale. Cliffs upon either hand in darkness plunged Built up a shadow; but far off, in front, Invaded by the first uncertain beam, Mountain on mountain like a cloud arose. He seemed ascending some old Titan stair, That led up to the sky by great degrees, In the vast dawn; he journeyed eagerly, Foot keeping pace with thought; for his full heart Tarried not, but was with its happy goal, One face, one form, one vision, one desire.

Due onward over the unending hills
He held his way, and the warm morning sprang
Behind him, and a less impatient speed
Drove his feet onward. In the midday heat
He rested weary; and relaxing thought,
Had leisure to perceive where he had come.

Burning beneath the solitary noon
All round him rose, rock upon rock o'erhung,
A fiery silence: undefended now

By clouding grief, nor in illusion armed,
He to the heavy lure all open lay
That from this mortal desolation breathed.
Out of his heart he sought to summon up
The vision, but it fled before his thought.
Only the hot blank everywhere opposed
His spirit, and the silent mountain wall.
Like one, on whom the fear of blindness comes,
For whom the sun begins to fall from heaven,
And the ground darkens, he rose up and fled,
Grasping his staff; and fearful now to pause.
In that death-breathing region, onward ran.

Yet was not peril past. He had not come Par, when his agitated eyes beheld. Amid the uneven crumbling ground, a stone Square-hewn and edgeways fallen; and he knew That he had come where men long since had been. And as he lifted up his eyes, all round Were massy granite pillars half o'erthrown, Propping the air; and yellow marble shone, Dimly inscribed, fragments of maimed renown. Over the ruined region he stole on, Threading the interrupted clue of roads That led all to oblivion, trenches choked With weed, and old mounds heaped on idle gold. And now Porphyrion paused, inhaling fast Odours of buried fame: as in a dream, All thateremote dead city and her brisk streets, Repeopled and for mountain battle armed,

He apprehended. The deep wave of time Subsiding, had disclosed englutted wrecks, Which now so long slept idle, that they seemed To emulate the agelessness of earth; Did not the fondness of mortality Still haunt them, and a kind of youth forlorn, As if the Desert their brief fable, man, Indulging from austerest indolence, Forbore a just disdain.

Porphyrion,
With beating pulses, and with running blood,
Alone on ashes perishably breathed.
As he who treads the uncertain lava fears
Each moment that his rash foot may awaken
Fire from beneath him, from that sepulchre
Of smouldering ages fearfully he fled.
And sometimes he looked backward, lest his feet
Startle a shadowy population up
In the deserted sunlight, faces stern
Of fleshless kings, to claim him for their own:
So frail appeared the heaving of his breath,
So brief his pace, so idle his desire.

At last beyond the scarred gray walls he came, And gladly found the savage rock once more Beneath him, nor yet dared to rest or pause, But onward pressed, over the winding sides Of pathless valleys, where an echoing stream Ran far below; and ridges desolate He climbed, and under precipices huge And down the infinite spread slopes made way. The eagle steering in the upper winds, As, balanced out of sight, his eye surveyed From white Palmyra to Damascus, flushed Among faint-shining streams, saw him afar Journey a shadow never wearying From hour to hour: until at last the hills Less steep opposed him, toward the distant plains Declining in great uplands dimly rolled. Here were few stubborn trees, by sunset now With sullen glory lighted rich, till night Rose in the east, and hooded the bare world.

Porphyrion had ascended a last ridge Of many, and his eyes gazed out afar On boundless country darkening; he lay down At last, full weary: the keen foreign air Filled his delighted nostril: and his heart Was soothed. As on a troubled mere at night Wind ceases, and the gentle evening brings Beauty to that vext mirror, and all fresh In perfect images the lost returns; Serenely in his bosom rose anew The vision: somewhere in that distant world, He mused, is she; and there is all my joy.

But evening now before his gazing eyes Receded in, until the whole wide earth Appeared a cloud. Then in the gloom a dread Came whispering, and hope faltered in his breast: O if the great world be but fantasy
Raised by the deep enchantment of desire,
And melt before my coming like a cloud!
Parleying with the ghost of fear, yet still
Cherishing his thought's treasure, he resigned.
His senses to the huge and empty night,
When on the infinite horizon, lo!
Sending a herald clearness, upward stole
Tranquil and vast, over the world, the moon.

Delicately as when a sculptor charms The ignorant clay to liberate his dream, Out of the yielding dark with subtle ray And imperceptible touch she moulded hill And valley, beauteous undulation mild, Inlaid with silver estuary and stream, Until her solid world created shines Before her, and the hearts of men with peace, That is not theirs, disquiets: peopled now Is her dominion; she in far-off towns Has lighted clear a long-awaited lamp ' For many a lover, or set an end to toil, Or terribly invokes the brazen lip Of trumpets blown to Fate, where men besieged For desperate sally buckle their bright arms. All these, that the cheered wanderer on his height In fancy sees, the lover's secret kiss, The mirth-flushed faces thronging through the streets, And ships upon the glimmering wave, and flowers In sleeping gardens, and encounters fierce,

And revellers with lifted cups, and men In prison bowed, that move not for their chains, And sacred faces of the newly dead; All with a mystery of gentle light She visits; and in her deep charm includes.

BOOK III.

Dawn in the ancient heavens over the earth Shone up; but in Porphyrion's bosom rose A brighter dawn: the early ray that touched His slumber, woke the new, unfathomed need, Fallen from radiant night into his soul, That thirsted still for beauty; for that joy Beyond possession, ever flying far From our dim utterance, beauty causing tears.

He stretched his arms out to the golden sun, His glorious kin, impetuously glad, And with aërial morning journeyed on O'er valley and o'er hill.

The second dawn
Found him far-travelled over pastoral lands,
Where from the shepherds' lonely huts a smoke
Went up, or some white shrine gleamed on a height.
Soon the dark ranging and unchanging pines
Yielded to ash and chestnut; O how fair
Their perishable leaf! Porphyrion knew
That some great city neared him, and his face
Grew eager, climbing a soft-crested hill
In expectation; yet all unprepared

At last upon his eye the prospect broke, Dawning serene, and endlessly unrolled.

There lay the city, there embodied hope Rose to outmatch desire: he cried aloud. Taken with joy so irresistible, That he must seize a sapling by the stem To uphold him, and in ardent silence gazed. Solitary heaven, strown with vast white clouds, Moved toward him over the abounding land; A land of showers, a land of quivering trees, A land of youth, lovely and full of sap, Upon whose border trembled the wide sea. Young were the branches round him, in fresh leaf Lumingusly shaded; the arriving winds Broke over him in soft aërial surge; For him the grass was glittering, the far cloud Loosened her faltering tresses of dim rain, And broad Orontes interrupted shone. But mid that radiant amphitheatre He saw but the far city: thither ran His gaze, and rested on her, in a bloom Of distant air apparelled, while his heart Beat at the thought of what she held for him. Bright Antioch! From the endless ocean wave Gliding the sunbeam broke upon her towers, A moment gleaming white, then into shade Withdrawn, until she seemed a thing of breath, Created fair, from whose far roofs arose Soft, like an exhalation, human joy.

Clear as a pool to plunge in, seemed the world This blissful morn, to him that thither gazed, Wondering, until unconscious tears were wet Upon his flushing cheek, while he sent forth His eager thoughts flying to that sweet goal, And conjuring wishes waved unknown delight To come to him. Already in dream arrived, Close to his ear the hum of those far streets He hears; already sees the busy crowd Pass and repass, with laughter and with cries. Meeting him, children hand in hand from school Gleefully run, and old men, slow of step, Approach; the mason, pausing from his toil Under the plank's cool shadow, looks at him, Or, with a negligent wonder glancing down, Beautiful faces; O, perhaps the face That to his fate he follows through the world. That deepest hope, tob dear to muse upon, A moment filled him with a thrilling light: And as a bird, alighting on a reed Sprung straight and slender from a lonely stream, Some idle morning, delicately sways The mirrored stem, and sings for perfect joy; So musical, alighted young desire Upon his heart, that trembled like the reed.

Down from that height, over delicious grass, Amid the rocks, amid the trees, he sped: The browsing sheep upstarted in the sun, Scared by his coming; he ran on, and tore A fresh leaf in his mouth, or sang aloud Out of his happy heart; such keen delight His eye was treasuring, that welcomed all The variable blooms in the high grass, Borage and mullein and the rust-red plume Of sorrel, and the sprinkled daisies white. Even the sap in the young bough he felt Reach warmly up to the inviting sun, As if his own blood by the spring renewed Were-theirs, and budding leaves within his breast.

At last, ere he perceived it, he was close Upon the city walls: through shading boughs Across a valley they rose populous With crowding towers and roofs of distant hum. Then in the midst of joy he was afraid. So close to him the richness he desired Dismayed his spirit, that to doubt and fear Recoiling fell. Not yet will I go up, He thought; but when the dark comes, I will go. Even as his purpose was relaxed, his limbs To sudden heaviness surrendered: down He laid him in sweet grass beside a pool, Under a chestnut, opposite a grove Of cypress; and at once sleep fell on him: Deep sleep, that into dark unfathomed wells Plunges the spirit, and with ignorance lost Acquaints, and inaccessible delight, And unborn beauty.

But meanwhile the noon

Had ripened and grown pale in the soft sky. A gentle rain fell as the light declined; And, the drops ceasing, an unprisoned beam Out of a cloud flowed trembling o'er the grove, And ran beside long shadows of the stems, And lighted the dark underleaves, and touched The sleeper: suddenly his cheek was warm: He stirred an arm, and unrelaxing, sighed; And now, through crimsoned eyelids, on his brain The full sun burned; to wonder he awoke. Green over him, in mystery o'erhung, Was dimness fluttered with a thousand rays; Unfathómable green; that living roof A single stem upbore, whose mighty swerve Upward he followed, till it branched abroad In heaven, and through the dark leaves shone remote, Smooth-molten splendour, the broad evening cloud. Porphyrion upon his eibow leaned And hearkened, for the trembling air was hushed By hundred birds, praising the peaceful light Invisibly: a wet drop from the leaf Spilled glittering on his hand. Then he reclined Deep into joy, absolved out of himself, The while the wind brought to him light attired In fragrance, and the breathing stillness seemed Music asleep, too lovely to be stirred.

As thus he drew into his pining heart
Such juices as make young the world, and feed
The veins of spring; as into one pure sense

Embodied, he was hearkening blissfully, A sound came to him wonderful, like pain, With such a sweetness edged. It was a voice, A happy voice: and toward it instantly The fibre of his flesh yearningly turned, Trembling as at a touch. Then he arose Troubled: he looked, and in the grove beyond That peaceful water, lo! a little band Of youths and maidens under distant trees Departing: one looked backward ere she went; And his heart cried within his breast, awaked Suddenly into blissful hope. Alas! With flutter of fair robes and mingled, gay, Faint laughter, down a bank out of his view They were all taken. Pierced with sudden loss, And kindled like a wild, uncertain flame, Into a hundred joyful, wavering fears, He gazed upon the empty grove; the pool, And the light brimming over on fresh grass And lonely stems: but the bereaved bright scene No more rejoiced him. Now, to aid his wish, Swift night upon the fading west inclined: And he stole forward through the cypress gloom Toward Antioch. Halting on a neighbour brow, Afar off he beheld that company Even now under the dim gate entering in. He followed, and at last the darkened street Received him, wondering, back among his kin l.

Was ever haven like the dream of it

In peril? or did ever feet attain
Their goal, but still a richer rose beyond?
It was a festal night: gay multitudes
Came idly by, and no man noted him.
His seeking gaze, hither and thither drawn,
Roamed in a mirror of desires amazed,
And found, yet wanted more than it could find.
Beauty he felt around him brushing near,
And joy in others seen; but all to him,
Without the vision that his soul required,
Was idle: solitary was his heart,
And full to breaking: yet, as wounds are dulled
To the frail sense, he knew not yet his grief,
For wonder clothed it; through a veil he heard
And saw.

Thus wandering aimlessly he found His feet upon a marble stair; in face A porch rose; issuing was a festal sound, That drew him onward out of the lone night. Halting upon the threshold he gazed in.

Pillars in lovely parallel sustained
A roof of shadowed snow, enkindled warm
From torches pedestalled in order bright;
Amid whose brilliance at a banquet sat,
Crowned with sweet garlands, revellers, and cups
Lifted in laughing, boisterous pledge, or gazed
Earnestein joy, on their proud paramours.
Pages, with noiseless tripping feet, had borne.
The feast aside; and now the brimming wine

From frosted flagons blushed, and the spread board Showed the soft cheek of apricot, or glory Of orange burning from a dusk of leaves, Cloven pomegranates, brimmed with ruby cells, Great melons, purpling to the frosty core, And mountain strawberries. Beyond, less bright, Was hung mysterious magnificence Of tapestry, where, with ever-moving feet, A golden Triumph followed banners waved O'er captive arms, and slender trumpets blew To herald a calm hero charioted.

Just when a music, melted from above,
Over the feasters flowed, and softly fixed
The listening gaze, and stilled the idle hand,
Porphyrion entered; all those faces flushed,
Lights, flowers and laughter, and the trembling wine,
And hushing melody, and happy tume
Of the clear torches burning Indian balm,
Clouded his brain with sweetness, like a waft
Of perished youth returned; those wonders held
His eyes, yet were as things he might not touch,
And, if he stretched his hand out, they would fade.

Then he remembered whom he sought. A pang Disturbed him; eager with bright eyes inspired, Through those that would have stayed his feet, he stole Nearer to buss. They all regarded him Astonished; in their joyful throng he seemed An apparition: darkly the long hair

Hung on his shoulders, and his form was frail.

Some cried, then all were silent; a strange want

Woke in their sated breasts, and wonder dread

Troubled them, whence had come and what required

This messenger unknown. But he passed on,

And in each woman's face with questioning gaze,

Dazzled by nearer splendour, looked, and sought,

Doubtful.

Already one, whose arm was laid Around the shoulder of her paramour, Stayed him, so deep into his heart she looked, Biting her pearly necklace: in her robe Was moonlight shivering over purple seas. Encountering, their spirits parleyed: then Unwillingly he drew his eyes away. Another, clothed as in the fiery bloom Of cloud at evening changing o'er the sun, Backward reclining, under lids half-closed Gazed, and a moment held him at her feet: Until at last one turned and dazzled him, Of whose attire he knew not, so her face With sun-like glory drew him: he approached; And she, presiding beauteous and adored Queen of that perfumed feast, beckoned him on. Her bosom heaved; the music from her ears Faded, and from her sated sense the glow Of empty mirth: far lovelier were in him Sorrow and youth and wonder and desire. Forward she leaned, and showed a vacant place By her, and he came near, and sat him down,

Charm-stricken also, whispering, Art thou she? She said no word, but to his shining eyes Answered, and of the red pomegranate fruit Gave him to eat, and golden wine to drink, And with pale honeyed roses crowned his hair. All marvelled, and with murmur looked on him, As, high exalted over realms of joy, He sat in glory, and sweet incense breathed Of that dominion, riches in a cloud Descending, and before his feet prepared The world in bloom, and in his eyes the dream. Of destiny excelled, and rushing thoughts Radiant, and beauty by his side enthroned.

BOOK IV.

LOVE, the sweet nourishing sun of human kind, Who with unquenchable fire inhabitest Worlds, that would fall into that happy death Out of their course, were not their course so fixt; Who from the dark soil drawest up the plant, And the sweet leaves out of the naked tree: Whose ardent air to taste and to enjoy All flesh desire, even of bitter pangs Enamoured, so that this intenser breath They breathe, and one victorious moment taste Life perfect, over Fare and Time empowered; Leave him not desolate, Love, who to thy glory Is dedicated, and for thee endures-To look upon the dreadful grave of joy, Knowing the lost is lost; comfort him now, Thy votary, who by the pale sea-shore In the young dawn paces uncomforted. Ah, might not sweet embraces have assuaged The fever which had burnt him, honeyed mouth And the close girdle of voluptuous arms? Nor dimly fragrant hair have curtained him From memory? Alas, too new he came, From love, too recent from that ecstasy;

And memory mocked him under the cold stars, With finished yet untasted pleasure sad.

Flying that fragrant lure, unhappy soul, By the dark shore he paces: and his eyes The dawn delights not, far off in the east Discovering the sleeping world, and men To all their tasks arousing, while she strews Neglected roses on the unchanging hills, And over the dim earth and wave unfolds Beauty, but not the beauty he desires. To her, to her, who in the desert touched His spirit, and unsealed his eyes, and showed Above a new earth a new sun, and brought His steps forth to this perilous rich world, Stirred with ineffable deep longing now He turned; ev'n to behold her from afar, To touch the hem of her apparel, seemed Sweeter ten thousandfold than absolute Taste and possession of a lesser charm.

Where art thou? cried he. Ah, dost thou behold My desolation and not come to me? O ere my sick heart all delight refuse, Return, appear! Or say in what far land Thou lingerest, that I may seek thee out And find thee, without whom I have no peace Nor joy, but wander aimless in a path Barren and undetermined o'er the world. Wilt not thou make thy voice upon the wind

Float hither, or in dew thy secret breathe To answer my entreaty?

The still shore
Was echoless, unanswered that sad cry.
Warm on the wave the Syrian morning stole.
Out of suspended hazes the smooth sea
Swelled into brilliance, and subsiding hushed
The lonely shore with music: such a calm
As vexes the full heart, inviting it,
Flattered with sighing pause Porphyrion's ear.
The sea hungered his spirit; he could not lift
His eyes from the arriving splendour calm
Of those broad waters, to their solemn chime
Setting his grief; and gradually vast
His longing opened to horizons wide
As the round ocean; deep as the deep sea
His heart, and the unbounded earth his road.

That inward stream and dark necessity,
Which drives us onward in the way of Time,
Moved his uncertain hesitating soul
Into its old course, and his feet set firm
To tread their due path, seeking over earth
The Wonder that made idle all things else.
He raised his brow, inhaling the wide air;
And the wind rose, and his resolve was set.

Broad on the morrow hoisting to the sun Her sail, a snip out of the harbour stands Bearing Porphyrion, fervent to renew His lonely pilgrimage; to fate his way • Committed, and to guiding beams of heaven; And careless whither bound, so the remote Irradiated circle, ever fresh, Glittering.into infinity, lead on.

Soon the bright water and keen kiss of the air His clouded courage cleared; uprising wind Swelled the resisting sail, and the prow felt The supple press of water, cleaving it; And the foam flashed and murmured; hope again Rose tremulous to that music's buoyant note. Day pursued day on the blue deep, and shores prang up and faded: still his gaze was cast Forward, and followed that undying dream.

Standing at last above a harbour strange, Inland he bent, ever with questioning heart Expectant; and through wilderness and town Journeyed all summer; nor could autumn tame That urging fire; nor mid the gliding leaves Of bare December could hope fall from him.

Ever a stranger roamed he, nor had thought
To seek a home; for him this vast desire
Was home, that fed his spirit and sheltered him
From care and time and the perplexing world.
For not beside an earthly hearth he deemed
To find her moving whom he sought, though fair
With human limbs, and clothed in lovely flesh.

Rather some visitation swift and strange His soul awaited. When at evening's end He rested and each fostered secret wish Rose trembling; when the dewy yellow moon Slowly on cypress gardens poured her light, . And from the flowery gloom and whispering Of leaves, a hundred odours had released, Dimly he knew that she was wandering near, A blissful presence, scarce beyond the marge Of his veiled senses, in a world of beams. Or journeying through the wild forest, he saw Her passing robe pale mid the shadowy stems A moment shine before his quickened steps To leave him in the deep forsaken gloom Pining with throbbing breast and desolate eyes; And once in the thronged market at hot noon Heard his name spoken, and looked round on air.

So visited, so haunted, he was led
Onward through many a city of the plain
Till vaster grew the silence, and far off
The noise of men; and he began to climb
Pastoral hills that into mountains rose
Skyward, with shelving ridges sloped between,
Long days apart.

And as he wound his way Thither, from crested town to town, he heard Rumours, of war all round him, men in arms Saw glittering in winding files, and waved Banners, and trumpets blown. But all to him Was distant, borne from a far alien world Where men in ignorant vain deeds embroiled Lost the treasure of earth and all their soul. Onward he kept his course, nor recked of them, Riding the solitary forest ways.

And now again it was the time of birth, When the young year arises in the woods From sleep, and tender leaves, and the first flower. Old thoughts were stirring in Porphyrion's breast, And old desires, like old wounds, flowed anew. It was that hour of hesitating spring When with expanded buds and widened heaven The heart swells into sadness, wanting joy More ample, and unnumbered longings reach Into a voide as tendrils into air. O now as never seemed he to have need Of his beloved, to be with her at last, To see her and embrace her with his arms, And in her bosom find perpetual peace. Scarcely aware of the bright leaves around His path, and heedless of his way, he rode With bridle slack and forward absent eyes, When piercing his deep dream a groaning cry Smote on him; he stayed still and from his horse Dismounted, and the rough briar pushed aside.

Hard by the path, amid the trodden grass And bloody brambles, lay a wounded mann Friend, fetch me water, groaned he, for I die. The spring is near, and I have crawled thus far But get no farther, struggle how I may.

Quickly Porphyrion ran to where the spring Gushed bubbling, and fetched water, and came back. The dying man drank deep, and having drunk Half rose upon his arm, and eager asked:

How went the battle? have we won or lost? I know not whether thou be friend or foe, But quick, tell me! I faint.

What sayest thou of battles? said Porphyrion; I know not Of what thou speakest, and I fight for none.

Faintly the other with upbraiding eyes
Regarding him, made answer. Art thou young
And is the blood warm in thy body, and yet
Thou wanderest idle? But perhaps thy hand
Knows not the sword, oner thou the ways of men?

Then kindled at his heart Porphyrion spoke.

I have no need of fighting, yet my hand
Knows the sword, and my youth was trained in arms.

Take then this blade, and bind my armour on. For over yonder hill I think even now They fight; there is our camp; ah, bid them come And bury Orophernes where he fell!

Even with the word he sank back and expired, Youthful amid the soft green leaves of spring, That over his pale cheek and purple lips > Waved shadowing.

Nearer than his inmost thought
Was then the silence to Porphyrion's heart,
As heavily he rode, bearing the sword
For token, and the helmet on his brows.
He sought for his old thoughts and found them not.
Even as when the sudden thunder breaks
A brooding sky, and the air chills, and strange
The altered landscape shines in a cold light
And they that loitered hasten on, and oft
Shiver in the untimely falling eve,
So now on this irruption of the world
Followed a sadness, and his thoughts were changed
And yearning chilled. How idle seemed his hope,
How infinite his quest! Before his mind
Life spread deserted, vacant as a mist.

So mournful rode he; when beyond a hill, Whose height, with hanging forest interposed, Shut off the sun, he came into the light Over against a valley broad that sloped Before him; and at once burst on him full All the glory of war and sounding arms. He thought no more, but gazed and gazed again.

Dark in the middle of the plain beneath An army moved against a city towered Upon a distant eminence: even now From the gate issued troops, with others joined New-come to aid them, and together ranked Stood to encounter stern the foes' assault. These upon either wing had clouded horse In squadrons, chafing like a river curbed By the firm wind that meets it; crest and hoof Shone restless as the white wind-thwarted waves.

Lonely and loud a sudden trumpet blew; And fierce a score of brazen throats replied. The sound redoubled in Porphyrion's soul And forward drew him; he remembered now His errand. In that instant the ripe war Broke like a tempest; the great squadrons loosed Shot forward glittering, like a splendid wave That rises out of shapeless gloom, a form Massy with dancing crest, threatening and huge, And effortlessly irresistible Bursts on the black rocks turbulently abroad, Falling, and roaring, and re-echoing far. So rushed that ordered fury of steeds and spears Under an arch of arrows hailing dark " Against the stubborn foe: they from the slope Swept onward opposite with clang as fierce: Afar, pale women from the wall looked down.

Porphyrion saw: he was a spirit changed. He hearkened not to memory, hope or fear, But cast them from him violently, and swift To fuse in this fierce impulse all regret, To woo annihilation, or to plunge

At least in fiery action his unused Vain life, and in that burning furnace melt The idle vessel and re-mould it new, Spurred his horse on into the very midst, And loud the streaming battle swallowed him.

Just on that instant when the meeting shock Tumultuously clashed, and cries were mixt With glitter of blades whirled like spirted spray, He came: and as the thundering ranks recoiled, They saw him, solitary, flushed and young, A radiant ghost in the dead hero's arms.

Amazement smote them; in that pause he rode Forward; and shouting Orophernes' name Jubilant the swayed host came after him. Iron on iron gnashed: Porphyrion smote Unwearied; the bright peril stilled his brain, The terrible joy inspired him: by his side Vaunting, young men over their ready graves Were rushing glorious: many as they rushed Drank violent draughts of darkness unawares, And swiftly fell; but he uninjured fought. Easily as men conquer in a dream He passed through splintered spears, opposing shields And shouting faces, and wild cries, and blood; Till new a hedge of battle bristling sprang All round him, and no way appeared, and dark This way and that the rocking weight of war Swung heavy, shields and lances interclasped.

He in his heart felt hungrier the flame Burning for desolation, and he flushed, Sanguine of death; the sudden starting blood Inflamed him, drunk as with a mighty wine. And on an instant terror from the air Upon the foemen fell; from heart to heart As in mysterious mirrors flashed; afar Triumphing cries rose all at once, and death Shone dazzling in their eyes, and they were lost.

Then on them rushed the victors glorying. Shaken abroad the battle fiercely flowed, Wild-scattering sudden as quicksilver stream Spilled in a thousand drops; the electric air Pulsed with the vehemence of strong bodies hurled In mad pursuit, till yielding or in flight Or fallen, the defeated armies ran Broken, and on the wall the women wailed.

Then to their camp the victors came, and all Followed Porphyrion wondering, and acclaimed His triumph: he in an exultant dream Still moved, and had no thought, but from the lips Of bearded captains, as around their fires That night they told of old heroic deeds, Heard his own praise, and feasted, and afar Drank, like an ocean wind, the air of fame.

BOOK V.

MEANWHILE in the surrendered city, night Wert heavy, not in feasting nor in sleep. Proud in submission were those stubborn hearts, And nursed through darkness thoughts of far revenge, Mixt with the glory of their courage vain. And now as the first beam revisited Their sorrow, and to each his neighbour's face Disclosed, they stood at leisure to perceive How grimly famine on their limbs had wrought, And on their wasted cheeks and temples worn; And from their eyes shone desolated fire, Inflexible resolve unstrung in the end. They saw the sentinels with haughty pace Trample the thresholds of their homes, and watched In melancholy indolence all day Soldiers upon their errands come and go.

At evening afar off a bugle blew,
Sounding humiliation and despair
To them, but triumph to their conquering foes,
Who now in bright magnificence arrayed
Their hosts to enter the dejected walls.
Feigning indifference, each man to his door

Came forth; beneath the battlemented arch Too soon detested ensign and proud plume They saw; the broad flag streaming to the air Fresh flowered purples, like a summer field, The trumpets blown, the thousand upright spears Shining, and drums and ordered trampling feet.

But in the van of these battalions stern All wondered to behold a single youth, Riding unhelmeted with ardent mien, And all about him casting his bright eyes. Up through the thronged street triumphing he rode. But as he passed, his radiant look, that seemed From some far glory to have taken light, Shining among dark faces, suffered change. Nothing on either side but hate or woe, Defiant or averted, sullen youth And wasted age, all misery, smote his gaze. As the sun's splendour leaves a mountain peak Sinking into the west, and ashy pale Leaves it, the sadder from that former'glow, So from Porphyrion's face the glory ebbed, His eye grew dim, and pain altered his brow.

At last that conquering army, with the night, Possessed the city; and a hum arose Like busy noise of settling bees; and fires, Kindled, shed broad into the gloom a blaze; And there were sounds of feasting and loud mirth, And riot late, until by slow degrees Returned darkness and silence, and all slept.

Only Porphyrion slept not: on his bed,
Turning from lamentable thoughts in vain,
He lay. But in that stillest hour, when first
Stars fade, and mist arises, and air chills,
Quite wearied out with toil and war within,
Slumber at length fell on him; but not peace.
Scarce had he wandered in the ways of sleep
Some moments, when before his feet appeared,
Solemn and in the bright attire of dreams,
She whom his waking soul so many days,
So many months, had followed still in vain,
His dearest unattainable desire.
But now ohe looked into his face, and saw
His grief, and met him with reproachful eyes.

What dost thou here, Porphyrion? Her grave voice Was musical with sorrow. Faintest thou In seeking me, thy joy, tired of the way Because the hour is not yet come to find? Dost thou forget what in thy desert cell I warned thee to be perilous on thy path, Luring of loud distraction, and delay, The vastness of the world and thy frail heart? Seek on, faint not, prove all things till thou find; And still take comfort; where thou art, I am.

Her voice, that trembled in the dreamer's soul From some celestial distance, like a breeze, Ended: the brightness went, and he awoke.

And lo, the placid colours of the dawn Were stealing in: he rose, and came without.

Ah, now, sweet vision, O my perfect light,
I come to thee, my love, my only truth!
It was not I, but some false clouding self
That fell bewildered in this erring way;
Or an oblivion rose from underground
To blind me; but this place of grief and blood
I leave, to follow thee for evermore.

Full of this fervent prayer, through the dim street He went: the stillness hearkened at his heels. Now as he passed, in chilly waftings fresh He scented the far morning: the blue night Thinned, and all pale things were disclosed; and now Even in his earnest pace he could not choose But pause a moment'; for all round he saw Faces and forms lying in shadowy sleep Within dark porches, and by sheltering walls, And under giant temple-colonnades, Utterly wearied. Some in armour lay Dewy, with forehead upturned to the dawn; And some against a pillar leaned, with hands Open and head thrown back; an ancient pair With fingers clasping slambered, by whose side A bearded warrior moved in his dark dream Exclaiming fiercely; and a mother presseu Her baby closer, even in her sleep. He gazed upon them by a charm detained.

For heavy over all their slumber weighed;
And if one lifted voice or arm, it was
As plants that in deep water idly stir
And then are still: so these, bodies entranced,
Lay under soft oblivion deeply drowned.
But, as they slept, the light stole over them
By pale degrees, and each unconscious soul
Yielded his secret: with the hues of dawn
Into that calm of faces floated up
Out of their living and profound abyss
What thoughts, what dreams, what terrors, what dumb wails!

What gleams of ever-burning funeral fires On haunted deserts where delight had been! Glories, and dying memories, and desires! What sighs, that like a piercing odour rose From the long pain of love, what beauty strange Of joy, and sweetness unreleased, and strength Fatally strong to bear immortal woe, And anguish darkly sepulchred in peace.

Porphyrion gazed, and as he gazed, he wept. For he beheld how in those spirits frail, Slept also passions mightier than themselves, Waiting to rend and toss them; tiger thoughts, Ecstasies, hungers, and disastrous loves, Violent as storms that sleep under the wave, Vast longing cruelly in flesh confined, And wrecking winds of madness and of doom. He trembled; yet as knowledge, even of things

Terrible, hath power to calm and to sustain, His soul endured that truth, and to its depth Feared not to plunge. Now he began to love, And to be sorrowful with a new sorrow.

What have I done, he sighed, what have I lost, My brothers, that I have no part in you? Yet am I of your flesh and you of mine. Sleep for this hour hath separated you From one another, but from me for ever. O that I could delay with you, and bear Your lot! or with enchanting wand have power To rasse you out of slumber into peace! To be entwined and rooted in that life Which brings you want of one another, pain Borne not alone, and all that human joy, How sweet it were to me! O you of whom, When you awaken, others will have need, I envy you those trusting eyes, and hands Put forth for help: I envy all your grief. But I am all made of untimeliness. Necessity drives on my soul to pass. Another way; my errand is not here. Farewell, farewell, O happy, troubled hearts!

As a blind man who reels around him move The blest, who see, and fancies them embraced Or feasting in each other's joyous eyes; With such deep envy often he turned back, Even as he went, to those unconscious forms That slumbered. But his spirit urged him on, With kindled heart and quickened feet: and now He neared the shadow of the city gate, And saw the mountains rise beyond, far off.

With longing he drew in the freshened air. But even at that moment he perceived, Standing before a doorway in the dawn, A solftary woman, motionless As cloud at evening piled in the pale east After retreating thunder: like the ash Of a spent flame her cheek, and in her eyes Deep-gazing, a great anguish lay becalmed. Coldly she looked on him, and calmly spoke In marble accent: Enter and behold What thou hast done!

He would have passed due on, Following his way resolved, but like a charm Beautiful sorrow in this grave regard

Drew him aside. He entered and beheld.

Upon a bed, unstirring and supine,
Lay an old man, so old that the live breath
Seemed rather hovering over him, than warm
Within his placid limbs; yet had he strapped
Ancient armour upon him, and unused
A heavy sword lay by him on the ground.
Dim was the room: a table in the midst
Stood empty; in the whole house all was bare.

Now when Porphyrion entered, and with him The woman, the old man nothing perceived: But at the sound a boy, that by the wall Was leaning, opened wide his painful eyes. Porphyrion with accusing heart beheld. Then to the woman turning, of their story He questioned: quietly she answered him.

We were four souls under a happy roof Until your armies came. Then was our need More cruel every day. When first our meat Grew scarce, we sat with feigning eyes and each The other shunned. I know not who thou art. But if thou takest pity upon pain, I pray that no necessity bring thee Hunger more dear than love. With me it was So that I dared not look upon my child Lest I should grudge-him eat. To my old father, Whom age makes helpless as a child, my breast As to a child I gave: and I have stood Under the trees and cursed them that so slow They budded for our want: the buds we tore Ere they could grow to leaf. So passed our days. But worse the nights were, when sleep would come

For hunger, and the dieadful morn seemed sweet. And if thou wonder that I weep not now Recounsing them, it is that I have borne What carries beyond grief.

She in her tale

Spoke nothing of her husband: he lay cold
Without the city fallen; but as now
She ended, the returning thought of him
Absented her sad eyes. And suddenly
Her heart, of a strange tenderness aware,
Out of its heavy frost was melted: then
She bowed her head, and she let forth her tears.

You that have known that bitter wound, of all The bitterest, since no courage brings it balm, When silent all the misery of the world

Knocks at your door and you have empty hands, You know what dart entered Porphyrion's breast, As he beheld and heard.

But now the boy
Turning with restless body and parched lip
Sighed, Give me water! I am so thirsty, mother,
I cannot fetch the breath into my throat.

Porphyrion filled a cup and gave to him. Deeply he drank, closing his eyes, as bliss Were in the cold fresh drops: unwillingly His fingers from the cup relaxed; and now The mother spoke.

Yesterday on the walls
One of your arrows smote him, and the wound
Torments him. If thou wilt, make water warm,
I pray thee, and bind up his cruel hurt
Afresh; for my hand trembles, I am weak.

So he made water warm, and washed the wound With careful tender hands, and ointment soft Laid on, and in sweet linen bound it up.

Comforted then the boy put round his neck
One arm, and sighing thanks, as a child will,
With faltering hand caressed him. That fond touch
Porphyrion endured not. Are men born
So apt to misery, thought he, that even this
Is worthy thanks? Yet his wrought heart attained
Even in such slender spending of its love
A little ease.

Now, said he, I must go,
I must not longer tarry: for she calls,
Whom I am vowed to follow and to find.
But when he looked upon those three, they seemed
To need him in their helplessness; the child
Divining, mutely prayed him: he resolved
For that day to remain and then to go.

So all that day he tended them and went
Abroad into the town, and brought them food,
Bartering his share of spoil for meat and bread,
And freshest fruit, and delicatest wine;
Nor marked he as he went the frowning eyes
Of the stern soldiers, how they stood and watched
Murmuring together, sullen and askance.
As in a slumbering great city, snow
With gentle foot comes muffling empty ways,
Corners and alleys, and to the tardy dawn
Faint the murmur of toil ascends, and dumb

The wheels roll, and the many feet go hushed, So on his mind lay sorrow: hum of arms And voices, all were soft to him and strange.

Day passed, and evening fell, and in that house All slept; and once again he would renew His journey; but once more his heart perplexed Smote him, to leave them so: They have no friend, He said, and who will tend them, if not I? The next day he abode, and with fond care Ministered to their need, and still the next Found him delaying and his own dim pain Solacing sweetly; for the old man now By faint degrees returned to healthful warmth, And grave with open eyes serenely looked In a mild wonder on this unknown friend: The mother, taxed no longer to endure Even to her utmost strength, permitted calm To her worn spirit, and her wasted limbs Resigned into a happy weariness; And the child's hurt began to be appeased.

On the fourth morn Porphyrion arose,
And saw them all still laid in peaceful sleep.
Now, said he, will I go upon my quest,
Less troubled: they have need of me no more.
He turned to go, but in the early light
Still looked upon them, and his heart was full,
And softly he unbarred the door, and seemed
Within his soul to see the whole great world

Await his coming, and its wounded breast Disclose, and all life radiantly unroll Her riches, opening to an endless end.

Filled with the power of that impassioned thought, Into the silence of the morning sun

He came; and on a sudden was aware

Of men about the entrance thronged; they set

Their bright spears forward, and his path opposed.

Astonished, he looked on them, and perceived

The faces of those warriors he had brought

Thither exulting, and in victory led;

Yet oh their faces he beheld his doom.

He stood in that great moment greatly calm,

Proudly confronting them, and cried aloud:

What murmur you against me? I for you Fought, and you triumphed. Have I asked of one A single boon? Soldiers, will you take arms Against your captain? Men, will you dare to strike A man unarmed? You answer not a word! Put up your swords; for now I will pass on To my own work, and as I came will go.

There was a stillness as he ceased, and none Answered, but none gave way. As when in heaven Clouds curdle, and the heavy thunder holds All things in stupor hushed, they stood constrained, Menacing and mistrustful; and their heaps Grew cruel: the uncomprehended light, • That in Porphyrion shone and flushed his brow

With radiance, like the bright ambassadot Come from an unknown power, tormented them; And dark enchanting terror drove them on. Then one by stealth an arrow to his bow Fitted, and strung, and drew it, and the shaft Beside Porphyrion in the lintel stuck Quivering: and at once they fiercely cried. Like the loud drop that loosens the pent storm, That loosened arrow drew tempestuous hail From every bow: they lusted after blood, And out far from them pity: and he fell Before them. Yet astonished and dismayed, Those sacrificers saw the victim smile Triumphing and incredulous of death, Even in anguish: pang upon fresh pang Rekindled the lost light, the perished bloom Of memory, and he was lifted far In exaltation above death; he drank Wine at the banquet, and the stormy thrill Of battle caught him, and he knew again The dart of love and the sweet wound of grief In one transfigured instant, that illumed And pierced him, as the arrows pierced his side. Then, mingling all those bright beams into one Full glory, dawned upon his dying sense She whom his feet followed through all the world Out of the waste, and over perilous paths, Dearer than breath and lovelier than desire. Like the first kiss of love recovered new Was the undreamed-of joy, that he in death

With the last ecstasy of living found,
Tasted and touched, as she embraced his soul.
Then the world perished: stretching forth his arms,
Into the unknown vastness eagerly
He went, and like a bridegroom to his bride.

THE FIRE.

WITH beckoning fingers bright
In heaven uplifted, from the darkness wakes,
Upon, a sudden, radiant Fire,
And out of slumber shakes
Her vild hair to the night;
Bewitching all to run with hurried feet,
And stand, and gaze upon her beauty dire.

For her: the shrinking gloom
Yields, and a place prepares;
An ample scene and a majestic room:
Slowly the river bares
His bank; above, in endless tier,
Glittering out of the night the windows come,
To that bright summons; and at last appear,
Hovering, enkindled, and unearthly clear,
Steeple, and tower, and the suspended dome.

But whence are these that haste
So rapt? what throngs along the street that press,
Raised by enchantment from the midnight waste,
That even now was sleeping echoless:
Men without number, lured from near and far
As by a world-portending star!

Lo, on the bright bank without interval Faces in murmuring line, With earnest eyes that shine, Across the stream gaze ever; on the wall Faces; and dense along the bridge's side Uncounted faces; softly the wheels glide Approaching, lest they break the burning hush Of all that multitude affush With secret strange desire. Warm in the great light, as themselves afire, Thousands are gazing, and all silently! How to the throbbing glare their hearts reply, As tessing upward a dim-sparkled plume, The beautiful swift Fury scares the sky. The stars look changed on high, And red the steeples waver from the gloom. Distantly clear over the water swells The roar: the iror, stanchions dribble bright, And faltering with strong quiver to its fall, Drops, slowly rushing, the great outer wall. From lip to lip a wondering murmur goes, As crouching a dark moment o'er its prey, Swiftly again upleaps The wild flame, and exulting madly glows; The city burns in an enchanted day. Still the great throng impassioned silence keeps, Like an adoring host in ecstasy. ' Did eyer vision of the opened sky Entrance more deeply, or did ever voice Of a just wrath more terribly rejoice?

THE FIRE.

ŧ

The houseless beggar gazing has forgot His hunger: happy lovers' hands relax; They look no more into each other's eyes. Wrapt in its mother's shawl The fretting child no longer cries. And that soul-piercing flame Melts out like wax The prosperous schemer's busy schemes: The reveller like a visionary gleams. An aged wandering pair lift up their heads Out of old memories: to each, to all, Time and the strong world are no more the same, But threatened, perishable, trembling, brief, Even as themselves, an instant might destroy, With all the builded weight of years and grief, All that eld hope and pleasant usage dear. Glories and dooms before their eyes appear; Upon their faces joy, Within their bosoms fear!

Is it that even now
In all, O radiant Desolation, thou
Far off prefigurest
To each obscurely wounded breast
The dream of what shall be?
And in their hearts they see
Rushing in ardent ruin out of sight
With all her splendour, with her streaming robe
Of seas, and her pale peoples, the vast globe
A sudden ember crumble into night?

MARTHA.

A woman sat, with roses red Upon her lap before her spread, On that high bridge, whose parapet Wide over turbulent Thames is set, Between the dome's far glittering crest And those famed towers that throng the west. Neglectful of the summer air That on her pale brow stirred the hair, She sat with fond and troubled look, And in her hand the roses shook. Shy to her lips a bloom she laid, Then shrank as suddenly afraid: For from the breathing crimson leaf The sweetness came to her like grief. Dropping her hands, her eyes she raised, And on the hurrying passers gazed. Two children loitering along Amid that swift and busy throng, Their arms about each other's shoulder, The younger clinging to the older, Stopped, with their faces backward turned To her! the heart within her yearned. They were so young! She looked away:

O, the whole earth was young to-day! The whole wide earth was laughing fair; The flashing river, the soft air, The horses proud, the voices clear Of young men, frequent cry and cheer, All these were beautiful and free, Each with its joy: Alas, but she! She started up, and bowed her head, And gathering her roses fled.

Through dim, uncounted, silent days, She had trod deep-secluded ways; Mid the fierce throng of jostling lives, Whom unrelenting hunger drives, Close to the wall had stolen by; Yet could not shun Calamity. Her painful thrift, her patient face, Could not the world-old debt erase; Nor gentle lips, nor feet that glide, Persuade the sudden blow aside. This morn, when she arose, her store, Trusted to others, was no more. No more avail her years of care. She must her bosom frail prepare, Exposed in her defenceless age, Against the world and fortune's rage. For bread, for bread, what must be done ? She stole forth in the morning sun. I will sell flowers, she thought: this way Seemed gentler to her first dismay.

Soon to the great flower-market, fair With watered leaves and scented air, She came: her seeking, timorous gaze Wandered about her in amaze. The arches hummed with cheerful sound: Buyers and sellers thronged around: Lilies in virgin slumber stirred Hardly, the gold dust brightly blurred Upon their rich illumined snow, As the soft breezes come and go. From her smooth sheath, with ardent wings, Purple and gold, the iris springs; Beep-umbered wall-flowers, dusk between The radiance and the odour keen Of jonguils, this sad woman's eyes And her o'erclouded soul surprise. But most the wine-red roses, deep In sunshine lying, warm asleep, Breathing perfume, drinking light Into their inmost bosoms bright, Seem fathomlessly to unfold A treasure of more price than gold. Martha, o'ercome by wonder new, Into her heart the crimson drew: The colour burning on her cheek, She stood, in strange emotion weak. But she must buy. Her choice was made: Red rose upon red rose she laid, Lingering; then hastened out, with eyes Bright, and her hands about the prize,

And quickened thought that nowhere aims. Soon, pausing above glittering Thames, She spreads the flowers upon her knees. Vast, many-windowed palaces Before her raised their scornful height And haughtily struck back the light. She scarcely marked them; only bent Her fond gaze on the flowers, intent To bind them in gay bunches, drest So to allure the spoiler best. But now, as her caressing hand Each odorous gay nosegay planned, A new grief smote her to the heart: Must she from her sweet treasure part? They seemed of her own blood. I cannot shame my roses so: I will get bread some other way. So she shut out all thought. The day Was radiant; and her soul, surprised To beauty, and the unsurmised Sweetness of life, itself reproved That had so little felt and loved! O now to love, if even a flower, To taste the sweet sun for an hour, Was better than the struggle vain, The dull, unprofitable pain, To find her useless body bread. Strick n with grievous joy, she fled.

She fled, but soon her pace grew faint.

She paused awhile, and easier went. Often, in spirits wrought, despair, Not less than joy, the end of care, A lightness feigns: for all is done, And certainty at last begun. Martha, with impulse fresh recoiled From empty years, forlorn and soiled, Trembled to feel the radiant breeze Blowing from unknown living seas, And rising eager from long fast Drank in the wine of life at last. Now, as some lovely face went by, She noted it with yearning eye; She joyed in the exultant course Of horses, and their rushing force.

At last, long wandering, she drew near Her home; then fell on her a fear, A shadow from the coming Hours. By chance a hawker crying flowers His barrow pushed along the street, And the dull air with scent was sweet. As on her threshold Martha stood, A sudden thought surprised her blood. Quickly she entered, and the stair Ascended; first with gentle care Cooled her tired roses: then a box. Of little hoardings she unlocks, and brings her silver to the door And buys till she can buy no more.

Laden she enters: the drear room " Glows strangely; the transfigured gloom Flows over, prodigal in bloom. Her lonely supper now she spread; But with her eves she banqueted. Over the roofs in solemn flame The strong beam of the sunset came. And from the floor striking a glow Burned back upon the wall; and lo! How deep, in double splendour dyed, Blushed the red roses glorified! When darkness dimmed them, Martha sighed. Yet still about the room she went Touching them, and the subtle scent Wandered into her soul, and brought All memories, yet stifled thought. As in her bed she lay, the flowers Haunted her through the midnight hours: 'Twixt her shut lids the colours crept; But wearied out, at last she slept.

Next morning she awoke in dread.
O mad, O sinful me! she said.
What have I done? how shall this end
For me? Alas, I have no friend.
She strove to rise; but in her brain
A drowsy magic worked like pain.
She sank back in a weak amaze
Upon the pillow: then her gaze
Fell on the roses; she looked round,

And in the spell again was bound. The deep-hued blossoms standing by With serious beauty awed her eye; Upward inscrutable they flamed: Of that mean fear she was ashamed. All day their fragrance in the sun Possessed her spirit: one by one, She pondered o'er them, dozing still And waking half against her will. Her body hungered, but her soul Was feasting; gradually stole The evening shadow on her bed. She could no longer lift her head. Deep on her brain the flowers had wrought; Now in the dim twilight her thought Put trembling on a strange attire, And blossomed in fantastic fire. She stretched he, hand out in the gloom: It touched upon a living bloom. Thither she turned; the deep perfume O'ercame her; nearer and more near, And now her joy is in her fear, The lily hangs, the rose inclines, With incense that her soul entwines, Her inmost soul that dares not stir. The gentle flowers have need of her. Unpitying is their rich desire; Her breath, her being they require. O she must yield! She sinks far down, Conquered, listless, happy, down

Under wells of darkness, deep Into labyrinths of sleep, Perishing in sweetness dumb, By the close enfolding bloom To a sighing phantom kissed, Like a water into mist Melting, and extinguished quite In unfathomed odorous night.

At last, the brief stars paling, dawn
Breathed from distant stream and lawn.
The earliest bird with chirrup low
Called his mates; softly and slow
The flowers their languid petals part,
And open to the fragrant heart.
And now the first fresh beam returned.
Bright through the lily's edge it burned
And filled the purple rose with fire,
And brightened all their green attire,
And woke a shadow on the wall.

But Martha slept, nor stirred at all.

THE DRAY.

Dim through the darkened street
The Dray comes, rolling an uneven thunder
Of wheels and trampling feet;
The shaken windows stare in sleepy wonder.

Now through an open space,
Where loitering groups about the tavern's fume
Show many a sullen face
And brawling figure in the lighted gloom,

It moves, a shadowy force
Through misery triumphant: flushed, on high,
Guiding his easy course,
A giant sits, with indolent soft eye.

He turns not, that dim crowd Of listless forms beneath him to behold; Shawled women with head bowed Flitting in hasty stealth, and children old:

Calm as some conqueror
Rode through old Rome, nor heeded at his heel,
Mid the proud spoils of war,
What woeful captives thronged his chariot wheel.

ELEONORA DUSE AS MAGDA.

THE theatre is still, and Duse speaks. What charm possesses all, And what a bloom let fall On parted lips, and eyes, and flushing cheeks! The flattering whisper and the trivial word No longer heard, The hearts of women listen, deeply stirred. For now to each those quivering accents seem A secret telling for her ear alone: The child sits wondering in a world foreknown, And the old nod their heads with springing tear, Confirming true that acted dream. And the soul of each to itself revealed Feels to the voice a voice reply, With a leaping wonder, a joy, a fear, It is I, it is I! But O what radiant mirror is this that dazzles me, That my dead rapture holds, That all my loss unfolds, That sets my longings free, My sighs renumbers, my old hope renews. I have lived in a sleep, I have tasted alien bread,

76 ELEONORA DUSE AS MAGDA.

I have spoken the speech, and worn the robes of the dead;

I have buried my heart away, and none believed.

But now, speak on, and my bonds untie:

At last, it is I, it is I!

MIDSUMMER NOON.

At her window gazes over the elms A girl; she looks on the branching green; But her eyes possess unfathomed realms, Her young hand holds her dreaming chin,

Drifted, the dazzling clouds ascend In indolent order, vast and slow, The great blue; softly their shadows send A clearness up from the wall below.

An old man houseless, leaning alone By the tree-girt fountain, only heeds The fall of the spray in the shine of the sun, And nothing possessing, nothing needs.

The square is heavy with silent bloom; The tardy wheels uncertain creep. Above, in a narrow sunlit room, The widower watches his child asleep.

THE PARALYTIC.

He stands where the young faces pass and throng;
His blank eyes tremble in the noonday sun:
He sees all life, the lovely and the strong,
Before him run.

Eager and swift, or grouped and loitering, they Follow their dreams, on busy errands sped, Planning delight and triumph; but all day He shakes his head.

SONGS OF THE WORLD UNBORN.

Songs of the world unborn
Swelling within me, a shoot from the heart of Spring,
As I walk the ample and teeming street
This tranquil and misty morn,
What is it to me you sing?

My body warm, my brain clear, Unreasoning joy possesses my soul complete; The keen air mettles my blood, And the pavement rings to my feet.

O houses erec't and vast, O steeples proud,
That soar serenely aloof,
Vistas of railing and roof,
Dim-seen in the delicate shroud of the frosty air,
You are built but of shadow and cloud,
I will come with the wind and blow,
You shall melt, to be seen no longer, O phantoms fair.
Embattled city, trampler of dreams,
So long deluding, thou shalt delude no more;
The trembling heare thou haughtily spurnest,
But thou from a dream art sprung,
From a far-off vision of yore,
To a dream, to a dream returnest.

80 SONGS OF THE WORLD UNBORN

Time, the tærrier, Time, the unshunnable, Stealing with patient rivers the mountainous lands, Or in turbulent fire upheaving, Who shifts for ever the sands, Who gently breaks the unbreakable barrier, Year upon year into broadening silence weaving, Time, O mighty and mightily peopled city, Time is busy with thee. Behold, the tall tower moulders in air, The staunch beam crumbles to earth, Pinnacles falter and fall, And the immemorial wall 'Melts, as a cloud is melted under the sun. Nor these alone, but alas, Things of diviner birth, Glories of men and women strong and fair, They too, alas, perpetually undone! As the green apparition of leaves Buds out in the smile of May; As the red leaf smoulders away, That frozen Earth receives: In all thy happy, in all thy desolate places, They spring, they glide, Unnumbered blooming and fading faces! O what shall abide?

Aching desire, mutinous longing, Love, the divine rebel, the challenge of all, Faith, that the doubters doubted and wept her fall,

SONGS OF THE WORLD UNBORN. 81

To an empty sepulchre thronging:

These, the sap of the earth,
Irresistibly sprung,
In the blood of heroes running sweet,
In the dream of the dreamers ever young,
Supplanting the solid and vast delusions,
Hearten the heart of the wronged to endure defeat,
The forward-gazing eyes of the old sustain,
Mighty in perishing youth, and in endless birth,
These remain.

THE SUPPER.

A PROLOGUE.

A rich youth invites a chance company of guests from the street a blind beggar, a sandwich-man, a tramp, two women, and a thief, all fallen in the world: they are seated at supper in a sumptuous room.

THE SUPPER.

Host.

LINGER not, linger not, lift your glasses.

Mirth shall come, as misery passes.

Hark, how the mad wind blows his horn

And hunts the laggards in streets forlorn!

Hark, how fierce the winter rain

Beats and streams on the window pane!

Ill is it now for the houseless head,

And for him that makes on the ground his bed.

But we will forget in the warmth of the fire,

And be glad, and taste of our heart's desire.

Laugh old care and trouble down

And toils and sad remembrance drown!

All is yours; all sorrow bury

To-night, and with me for an hour be merry.

MADGE.

You are kind, sir.

Ноѕт.

O believe you not.
That it makes my joy to cheer your lot?
You see me, who have lived my days

In riches, pleasure, friendship, praise.

I was not happy, I wanted more;
To-day I have found what I missed before.

I have sought you and brought you from cold and rain;
Now I will raise you out of your pain.

And you, old man, shall be young with me,
Brisk and glad as you used to be;
And you, child, with your cheeks so white,
Shall feel fresh blood in your pulse to-night.

Linger not, linger not, eat your fill,
Drink and be merry.

ALL.

We will, we will!

BLIND ROGER.

Set the glass in my hand. I'm blind and old, But still I shun to be left in the cold.

Host.

Is it hard at the first to remember the way Of mirth, and be rid of the load of the day? O, be not afraid to laugh and to smile.

Averill.

Our lips, it may be, are slow awhile, And our hearts unused to gaiety yet. But let us forget.

TONY.

Ay, let us forget.

MICHAEL.

That's easy, mates; but that's the least. Now we're set to so rare a feast, I'm ripe and ready for all gay cheer, But the great wax lights, so soft and clear, Abash me, and make my eyes afraid.

HosT.

Wait but a moment, the dazzle will fade:
Soon to your eyes will the light be as bloom,
And your ears be filled with the peace of the soom.
Were the wind but quiet, instead of the toil
And the traffic beneath, with its huge turmoil,
You'd fancy the lonely fields around.

ANNIE.

'Tis soft and calm, but I miss the sound.

AVERILL.

O, it is sweet for an hour to be lulled, For an hour to be happy with senses dulled.

TONY.

Ah, ah, the silver, how it gleams!

I have seen such glitterings in my dreams.

Roger.

Long, long ago, when my eyes could see, Such sweet odours used to be.

Michael.

What a fruit is this to melt in the mouth!

Host.

I have a garden in the South.
It brings me summer warm in frost,
Glories fallen and odours lost.
I love fresh roses in the snow;
I love them best when the leaves are low.

ANNIE.

What wonderful colours are these that burn In the red flower blushing beneath the fern.

Madge

How cold are your hands, lass!

Host.

Come to the fire.

Come, let us heap the bright coal higher. Now the sparks fly.

MICHAEL.

The fire is good;

The blessed red flames warm my blood.

Better this than the stars I saw

Shine last night, where I lay on the straw,

Through a chink in the roof of the mouldering shed.

Ha, ha! I thought it a famous bed,

And slept like a prince in his palace till day, When the cursing farmer drove me away.

Tony.

Once I sat in as fine a room;
The host was away, but we were at home;
We drank his health in his own red wine.
'Twas midnight when we sat to dine:
We filled our bellies, and slept for a spin.
And softly we laughed as the dawn came in.

MICHAEL.

Now we are merrier, now for a song. O, for some music to bear it along.

Roger.

I once could sing my song with the best; I rolled my voice up out of my chest. But the sap is dried in my bones: so you, That have voice and blood and all things new, Sing; with the burden we'll all come in.

Host.

Moisten your mouth then, ere you begin.

I pledge you, friends. Your health! and yours

MICHAEL.

May you be merry while breath endures.

TONY.

7

May you be merry, whatever befall.

ANNIE.

Good luck!

MADGE.

Good luck!

Host.

Good luck to you all!

MICHAEL [singing].

Wandef with me, wander with me: Care to the devil, be free, be free! Who but a fool would scrape and save, To heap up a molehill and live in a grave?

Roger [quavering].

Wander with me, wander with me!

MICHAEL.

I saw the old landlord, the miser gray,
Gather his greedy rents to-day.
The old gray rat with fiery eyes,
He stamped with his stick and he snuffed for a prize.
Lord, how the starveling tenants shivered,
And into his ravening claws delivered.
Death pulls at his foot with a right good will;
But he leshes his teeth with a relish still.
What prayers and excuses! I laughed to hear.
I that owed nothing, had nothing to fear.

Madge.

O men are cruel! I've seen them go And turn folks houseless into the snow.

MICHAEL [singing].

What rent pay I to the air and the sun? The days and the nights are mine, every one; When I've finished with one, there's another begun. Wander with me, wander with me, Care to the devil, be free, be free!

All.

Wander with me, wander with me!

MICHAEL.

Yes, I tell you, sir, I tell you, my friend, I drink your good luck, but be sure of the end. You never can tell you won't come to the cold, And the bed from under your body be sold. You smile at your ease; you pay no heed; You think to lay hands on all that you need, And still you go oiling your riches high; But where is the use of it all, say I?

Host.

Well said, my friend: you've a heart in your breast; And a brave heart beating is worth all the rest. Where is the use of it all? 'Tis true: But'we walk in the way we're accustomed to.

MICHAEL.

He with his riches, he dares not believe me!
With banquets and couches he thinks to deceive me.
Give me a glass of the bright stuff there;
And you, that sit so straight in your chair,
What are you thinking so sadly of, yonder,
You dreamer of dreams? To be merry and wander
Over the world, is it wiser, say,
Than to sit and grow fat and let life slip away,
Till your blood turns chill and your hair turns gray?

AVERILL.

I think I have wandered the whole earth round, An endless errand, nowhere bound.

I look straight, and nothing see
In the world, and no man looks on me.

What have I with men to do?
I hear them laugh, as I pass them through
In the street; I feel them stop and stare
At the boards that over my shoulder flare.

What matters my ragged and grimy coat,
My aching back, my parching throat?
I am a beacon to laughter and leisure;
I point all day the path to pleasure!

[A pause

MADGE.

How strange we look in the mirror tall! It casts a brightness about us all. Here are we round a table set, And until this night we had never met!

ROGER.

Your mirth soon flags. When I was young, We'd have been merry the whole night long.

MICHAEL.

Ay, mates, we're wasting our pleasure. Drink! We came not here to be sad and to think.

MADGE.

'Tis all day toiling that clouds the head.

HosT.

What do you do for daily bread?

MADGE.

I sell my matches along the street.
I see the young with nimble feet,
The fair and the foolish, the feeble and old,
That crawl along in the mire and the cold;
And the sound is always in my ears.
O the long, long crowding, trampling years,
Since I was young and followed after
The lights, the faces, the glee, the laughter!
But now I watch them hurry and pass
As I see you all now, there in the glass.
Annie, so pale? What ails you, lass?

Annie.

I am faint, I am tired; but soon 'twill go— On the payement I never felt it so; All is so strange here, I am afraid.

HosT.

Afraid? What grief, my girl, has made Such foolish fears come into your thought? We are all friends: and friends or not, None should harm you within these doors. Outside is the world that raves and roars. But you, I marvel how you, so slight, Endure alone so vast a fight.

ANNIE.

I know not how, but down in the street
'Tis not so heavy a task to meet.
A power beyond me bears me along,
The faint with the eager, the weak with the strong.
'Tis like an army with marching sound:
I march, and my feet forget the ground.
I have no thought, no wish, no fear;
And the others are brave for me. But here,
I know not why, I long to rest;
I have an aching in my breast.
O I am tired! how sweet 'twould be
To yield, and to struggle no more, and be free!

MICHAEL.

Courage, lass, hold up your head; Never give in till its time to be dead.

Host.

Nay, rest, if you will. Yet taste this wine, The cordial juice of a golden vine. 'Twill cheer your spirit, 'tis ripe and good, And it goes like sunshine into the blood.

MADGE.

Eat this fruit, too, that looks so rich, So smooth and rosy. Is it a peach? 'Tis soft as the cheek of a child, I swear.

Annie [absently].

As the cheek of a child?

MICHAEL.

Come, never despair— But the sad man, what is he mumbling there?

AVERILL.

To the lost, to the fresh,
To the sweet, to the vain,
Turn again, Time,
And bring me again.

I feel it from far
'Like the scent of a leaf;
I see and I hear;
It is joy, it is grief.

What have we done
With our youth? with the flowers,
With the breeze, with the sun,
With the dream that was ours?

Our thoughts that blossomed Young and wet! What have we drunken Quite to forget?

Where have we buried
Our dead delight?
We could not endure it;
It shone too bright.

O it comes over me Keener than pain. All is yet possible Once, once again!

[A silence.

Annie [starting up].

What am I doing?

Eating and drinking!
I strangle, I choke
With the pain of my thinking.
He wants me, he cries for me,
Somewhere, my boy,
My baby, my own one joy.
They said 'twas a sin to have borne him:
My sin was to desert him.
He that hung at my breast and trusted me,
How had I heart to hurt him?
I must go, through the night, through the cold, through the rain,
I must seek, I must toil, till I find him again.

HosT.

Stay, stay!

MADGE.

O Annie, how can you bear To tell your shame, where all can hear?

ANNIE.

I wish that I were lying
In my love's arms again.
My body to him was precious
As now it is worthless and vain.
What matters to me what you say? Let me go.
But you, O why did you wake my woe?
I wanted not feasting, nor mirth, nor wine,
Nor the things that I know shall never be mine,
I wanted only to sleep and forget.

HosT.

She's gone.

MADGE.

The night's wild.

Averill.

Wild and wet!

Tony.

Hark, how the wind in the chimney hums.

AVERILL.

It beats and threatens like distant drums.

Host.

Come to the fire. Fill once more Your glasses.

MICHAEL.

It is not now as before. The good drink tastes no longer well.

MADGE.

I am full of fears that I cannot tell.

Why am I weak and lonely and old?

ROGER.

Where is it gone? I seemed to behold For a moment, but now, the blessed light. Alas, again it is black, black night!

TONY.

I once was loved by a lass, I see Her smile, I hear her calling to me. Could I feel her kiss on my mouth again—

ROGER.

O could I see for a moment plain!

MICHAEL.

I had a friend, he was dearer than brother,

I loved him as I loved none ofher.

I struck him in drink; he left me for ever.

I shall grasp his hand again never, never!

AVERILL.

What have you done to us? Why have you brought All sad thoughts that ever we thought, And this evil spell around us cast?

MADGE.

We were all merry a moment past.

HOST.

What will you have, friends? What shall I do For your comfort? What shall I give to you?

AVERILL.

My youth!

ROGER.

My sight!

TONY.

My love!

MICHAEL.

My friend!

MADGE.

. O make me sure of peace in the end.

'Host.

I gave you freely of all I had, It is not my doing, you are not glad.

AVERILL.

We want.

¢

TONY.

We hunger.

AVERILL.

Ah, once more Let us hope, let us love, let us live.

MICHAEL.

Restore

What we have lost, what you possess; You that are stronger for our distress, You that have wakened our hearts this day.

Host.

My friend, you know not what you say.

ROGER [in a low voice].

Why did he ask us hither to-night?

MADGE.

And question, too, of our evil plight?

TONY.

Why did he drive us to be glad?

Roger.

To make us remember what once we had.

Madge.

Youth and happiness well forgot!

TONY.

To spy on our trouble.

MICHAEL.

A devil's plot!

Damn the poison! Drink no more!
I wish I had spilt my glass on the floor
Ere I made merry with him. His guest!
To watch us befooled, 'twas an excellent jest!

Roger.

I wish I could see his face.

MICHAEL.

He stands,

Pale and angry, with twitching hands.

O his sport is spoiled; he's vext to know

That we've found him out.

MADGE.

Let us go, let us go.

MICHAEL.

Ay, we've our pride, as well as he. Come out to the street, in the street we are free. TONY.

Curse the light that dazzled our eyes!

MICHAEL.

Curse the drink that taught us lies!

MADGE.

Say no more, but let's begone.

Roger.

Curse the mocker that lured us on!

MICHAEL.

May your pleasure perish, your grief increase, Your heart dry up.

Averill [breaking in].

Peace, friends, peace.

Ноят

[Astonished, and struggling with himself]. Ungrateful!

AVERILL.

You know not, sir, perchance, How misery turns the mind askance.

Host.

I pitied you.

Averill.

Pity, sir, 'tis well,
But it will not hold men up from hell.
Silence, friends: you have had your way,
Now 'tis for me to say my say.
Listen well, our host: my youth
Comes back; I burn with the fire of the truth.
It lights my thoughts and kindles my tongue;
And he must speak, whose heart is wrung.

Behold us, who ask not pity,
We were not what we are;
For a moment now we remember:
O, we have fallen far!

We are Necessity's children.
Our Mother, that bore us of old,
Has her mark on us all: she brings us
All, in the end, to her fold.

We have wandered in meadow and sun; But she calls us up from the flowers. She is our will, our purpose; The aching flesh is ours.

Hark, in the fulling tempest,

Close on the wild wind's heels,

The sound that makes men tremble,

The sound of her chariot wheels!

She cails. We must not tarry.

We must take up our yoke again,
With labouring feet for ever

To follow her triumph's train;

To follow her sleepless course, And to fall when she decrees With wailings that no man hearkens, With tramplings that no man sees,

With the great world glorying round us,
As the dying soldier hears,
Far off in the ebb of battle,
His conquering comrades' cheers.

Is your heart grown tender toward us?
Would you lift us up from the mire?
Would you set our feet in the way
To follow our far desire?

O, you must have strength to fashion
Our bones and bowels anew,
With fresh blood fill these bodies,
Ere we may have part with you.

Farewell, for our Mother calls:
We go, but we thank you, friend
Who have lifted us up for a moment,
To behold our beginning and end.

We are clothed with youth and fiches, We are givers of feasts to-night, We spread our plenteous table And heap it in your sight.

You need not to sharpen hunger; All shall be well appeased. If you find our fare to your pleasure, You shall depart well pleased.

Have you tasted a relish keener
Than the pang of useless pain?
Know you a spice more rare
Than the tears of wisdom rain?

Come, eat of the mad desires

That rend us we know not why,

The terrors that hunt us, the torment

That will not let us die.

Taste, it is ripe to bursting,
The sorrow-scented fruit,
That weakness sowed in darkness,
That found in the night its root,

• That blossomed in great despairs,

And is trodden to earth in scorn,

By the ignorant feet that trample

The faces of babes unborn.

The laughter of men that mock,
The silence of women that fear,
The shrinking of children's hands:
Come taste, all these are here.

Drink, drink of the blood-red wine,

That the smilers and scorners have pressed
From the wrongs of the helpless, the rending
And sobs of the fatherless breast.

We heap our table before you.

Eat and be filled: we go.

O friend, that had pity on us,

It is we that have pity on you!

Host

[Alone, after a long silence, raising his head].

Have I found in my own breast?
Like flames my thoughts upon me leap,
To eat my joy, to kill my sleep.
How dreadful is the silence here!
It weighs like terror on my ear.
Soon will the dawn be shining in,
And men awake, and birds begin;
And I must face the world afresh.
I faint, I fear it in my flesh.
I thought that I could love my kind!
Love is wast, and I was blind.
O mighty world, my weakness spare!
This love is more than I can dare.

THE RENEWAL.

No more of sorrow, the world's old distress,
Nos war of thronging spirits numberless,
Immortal ardours in brief days confined,
No more the languid fever of mankind
To-day I sing: 'tis no melodious pain
Cries in me: a full note, a rapturous strain
My voice adventures. Tremblest thou, my heart,
Because so eagerly the bliss would start
Up from thy fountains? O be near to me,
Thou that upliftest, thou that sett'st me free!

Out of the dim vault and the dying hues
Of Autumn, that for every wanderer strews
On silent paths the perishing pale leaves,
Fallen, like thoughts the heart no more believes,
From blackened branches to the frozen ground:
Out of the multitudinous dim sound
Of millions, to each other all unknown,
Warring together on the alien stone
Of streets unnumbered; where with drooping head
Prisoners pass, by unseen tyrants led
And with inaudible manacles oppressed,
Where he who listens cannot ever rest

For hearing in his heart the cry of men,
His brothers, from their lamentable den;
Out of all these I come to this sweet waste
Of woods and waters, and the odour taste
Of pines in sunshine hearkening to the roar
Of ocean on his solitary shore;
Lone beaches, where the yellow poppy blows
Unplucked, and where the wind for ever flows
Over the heathy desert; where the sea
Sparkles afar into infinity;
And the cleared spirit, tasting all things clean,
Rejoices, as if grief had never been;
Where thou, to whom the birds and the waves sing,
By some enchantment hast restored the Spring.

As when a dear hand touches on the hair
And thrills away the heaviness of care,
Till the world changes and through a window bright
The upleaping spirit gazes in delight,
Over my brain I feel a calming hand;
I look upon sweet earth and understand:
I hear the loud wind laughing through the trees;
The nimble air my limbs encourages,
And I upraise my songs afresh begun,
A palinode to the triumphant sun.

But thou, from whom into my soul to-day Enters a quivering glory, ray on ray, O by thine eyes a sister of the Spring, Striking a core of sweetness in each thing Thou look'st on, till it blossoms! By thy voice, Soul of all souls created to rejoice! Thou that with native overbrimming sense Takest the light of Beauty's effluence, As from the morning, in May's festal prime, The young green leaves of the swift-budded lime; That drawest all glad things, they know not why, By some dear magnet of felicity; And mournful spirits from their yoke of pain Enchantest, till they lift their necks again, And looking in thy bright and gentle eyes To thee devote their dearest enterprise; Thou whose brave heart could its own pain consume And turn to deeper tenderness; in whom Looks, thoughts, and motions, speech and mien persuade, Immortal Joy hath his own mansion made: How shall my too full heart, my stammering tongue, Render thee half the song which thou hast sung Into my being, by no web of words Hindered, and fluid as the note of birds? Or tell what magic of sweet air is shed On me, so radiantly comforted? I need each beam of the young sun; I need Each draught of the pure wind, whereon to feed My joy; each sparkle of the dew that shines Under your branches, dark, sun-drunken pines, All voices, motions of the unwearied sea; But most, O tender spirit, I need thee. For thou to this dumb beauty art the tone It fain would render; all that is thine own

Of wayward and most human and most sweet Mingling, until the music be complete: Thine accents, O adorable and dear, Command me to rejoice and have no fear; Out of remembrance wash the soil of pain And medicine me to my own self again.

Muse of my quickened verse, I am as he Who, striving in the vast up-swollen sea, Lifted a moment on a wave, descries Unrolling suddenly the boundless skies. Now is mere breathing joy; and all that strife Confused and darkling, that we miscall life, Is as a cloak, cast off in the warm spring. Thus to possess the sunlight, is a thing Worth more than our ambitions; more than ease Wrung from the despot labour, the stale lees Of youthful bliss: more than the plotting mind Can ever compass, or the heart can find In wisest books or multitude of friends. For this it is that brings us to the lap Of bounteous Earth, and fills us with her sap And early laughter; melts the petty ends Of daily striving into boundless air, Revealing to the soul what it can dare: Frees and enriches thousandfold; and steeps This trembling self-in universal deeps; Lends it the patience of the eternal hills To bear, no more in solitude, its ills, And with all fervours of the world inspires

Its re-awakened and divine desires. This is it that can find the deepest root In us, and urge unto the fairest fruit, Persuading the shut soul, that hid in night, To crowd its blissful leaves into the light, And shed, upon the lost, immortal seeds: Kindles into a forge of fiery deeds The smouldering heart, and closes the long wound Of gentle spirits by rough time untuned; And, O more precious even yet than this, Empowers our weakness to support in bliss The immensity of love, to love in vain Yet still to hunger for that priceless pain; To love without a bound, to set no end To our long love, never aside to bend In loving, but pour forth in living streams Our hearts, as the full morn his quenchless beams.

He that this light hath tasted, asks no more
Dim questions answerless, that have so sore
Perplexed our thinking: in his bosom flow
Springs of all knowledge he hath need to know.
Nor vaunts he the secure philosophy
Self-throned, that would so easily untie
The knot of this hard world: and judging straight
Pronounce its essence and declare its fate.
How should the universal heart be known
To him that can so hardly read his own?
For where is he that can the inmost speak
Of his own being? Words are blind and weak,

Perplexing phantoms, dim as smoke to fire, Mocking our tears, and torturing our desire, When soul with soul would mingle: even Love Never availed yet, howsoe'er he strove, But, like the moon, to yield one radiant part To the dark longing of the embracing heart. And Earth, shall her vast secret open lie Before the brief gaze of mortality? Yet wayward and self-wise, no sooner stept Into the world, and a few troubles wept, A few unripe joys garnered, a few sins Experienced, the impetuous mind begins Its habty wisdom; the world's griefs and joys Holds in a balance, and essays to poise. O persevering folly! never sleep Must weigh the lids of that soul who would reap This mystery; deserts vast must she explore, Many far towns, many an unguessed shore, And those deep regions search, more desolate far, Where lives are herded, ignorant what they are, And scarcely disentangling joy from woe; Their being must she put on, if she would know Humanity; most private bliss invade, And with extremest terror be afraid, Blank quiet and fierce rages apprehend. Nor less into the leaping air ascend Of flame-like spirits, and enamoured veins Feel pulse in her; to exquisitest pains Surrender. Then must her fleet impulse find A way into the solitary mind

Of creatures, that in thousand thousand forms Dumb life inspires and a brief sunshine warms; And into the blind springs of sap and seed Empty her passion, helpless with their need, Torn with their hunger, thirsting with their thirst; And deeper, whither eye hath never pierced, Search out, amid the unsleeping stir that fills Caves of old ocean and the rooted hills, Whether indeed these streams of being flow From inmost joy or a great core of woe. Not until then is her wide errand sped, Nor even so the supreme verdict said. For far into the outer night must fare The uncompleted spirit, that to dare Has but begun: now her commissioned bark She must adventure on an ocean dark, Illumined only by the driving foam Of stars imprisoned in the invisible home Each of his circle; age be lost in age Ere she accomplish half her pilgrimage; Nor till the last of those uncounted spheres Its incommunicable joys and tears Yield up to her, shall she at length return And homeward heavy with the message burn, And to her wonder-waiting peers rehearse The mighty meaning of the Universe.

O lovely Joy! and sweet Necessity, That wakes, empowers, and impassions me, It is enough that this illumined hour I feel my own life open like a flower Within me. Whether the worlds ache or no, Wearing a bright mask over breasts of woe, I have no need to learn; I only gaze Into thine eyes, dear spirit, that dost upraise My spirit; thy bright eyes, that never cease To thrill me with soft moonlike beams of peace. I look in them as into Earth's own eyes; Faith instantly my longing fortifies; And now I think no single day has hours, Nor year has days, nor life has years, for powers Of joy sufficing; for the things begun And waiting to be seen and felt and done. O give me all thy pains, let them be mine, And keep alone beloved delight for thine! I have a flame within me shall transmute " All to an ash, that shall bear flower and fruit, While thou look'st on me, while from thee there flows The invisible strength that in my spirit grows, Until like Spring, the blissful prodigal, It burns as it were capable of all That ever could be reached, enjoyed, or won, Or known, or suffered, underneath the sun.

But O why tarry we in language vain
And speak thus dimly of delight and pain?
Those human words have fallen out of sense,
Drunk up into intenser elements,
As colours perish into perfect light.
Now in the visitation of swift sight

That makes me for this happy moment wise Beyond all wisdom of philosophies, I feel even through this transitory flesh The pang of my creation dart afresh; The bonds of thought fall off, and I am free; There is no longer grief nor joy for me, But one infinity of life that flows From the deep ocean-heart that no man knows Out into these unnumbered semblances Of earth and air, mountains and beasts and trees, One timeless flood which drives the circling sear In furthest heaven, and whose weak waves we are. Mortal and broken oft in sobbing foam, Yet ever children of that central home, Our Peace, that even as we flee, we find; The Road that is before us and behind, By which we travel from ourselves, in sleep Or waking, toward a self more vast and deep.

O could my voice but sound to all the earth And bring thy tidings, radiant One, to birth In hearts of men! How would they cast away The shroud that wraps them from the spacious day, Burst the strong meshes they themselves have spun Of idle cares, and step into the sun, And see, and feel, and dedicate no more Their travail to some far imagined shore, Some dreamed-of goal beyond life's eager sphere, For lo! at every hour the goal is here; And as the dark woods tremble to the morn,

That shoots into their dewy depths forlorn Along the wind's path bright victorious rays, And in all branches the birds lift their praise, So should they sing, rejoicing to be free, As I, beloved Muse, rejoice in thee.

FEBRUARY MORNING.

PEACEFULLY fresh, O February morn,
Thy winds come to me: quiet the light slants
Through silver-bosomed clouds, that slowly borne
Across the wide heath, endlessly advance.

Now 'tis that pause before the leaping Spring, When over all things waiting comes a hush; And shyly, listen! the one vocal thing, Over his dewy notes lingers the thrush.

Now life, with all her hindering riddles, seems Simple as its green budding to the tree. Awhile the Fates forbear, and to my dreams, Sheltered awhile from truth, relinquish me.

In haven and at anchor rides my heart, And broods upon its swelling joys apart.

SONG.

LOVE, like cordial wine, Pouring his soul in mine, Bids me to sing; Youth's bright glory snatch, And Time's paces match With fearless wing.

Now, while breath is bliss, And dawn wakes me with a kiss, Ere this rapture flee, Ere my heart thou claim, Sorrow, I will aim A shaft at thee.

MAY EVENING.

So late the rustling shower was heard; Yet now the aery west is still. The wet leaves flash, and lightly stirred Great drops out of the lilac spill. Peacefully blown, the ashen clouds Uncurtain height on height of sky. Here, as I wander, beauty crowds In freshness keen upon my eye.

Now the shorn turf a glowing green
Takes in the massy cedar shade;
And through the poplar's trembling screen
Fires of the evening blush and fade.
Each way my marvelling senses feel
Swift odour, light, and luminous hue
Of leaf and flower upon them steal:
The songs of birds pierce my heart through.

The tulip clear, like yellow flame, Burns upward from the gloomy moulde As though for passion forth they came, Red hearts of peonies unfold: And perfumes tender, sweet, intense Enter me, delicate as a blade. The lilac odour wounds my sense, Of the rich rose I am afraid.

LOVE INFINITE.

WHERE the honeysuckle blows
In the summer night, entwined
With fresh leaves of the rose,
Greenness in gloom divined;
Sweet breaths in a mystery conspire
My soul to ravish in swift desire

Yet 1, as the hidden grass
I roam, within me bear
Joys that all these surpass,
And taste diviner air.
I love, I am loved: ah, nothing was ever sweet
As the word my lips to my heart repeat.

To take into my arms
The body of my bliss;
Charm beyond earthly charms,
Thought beyond thought were this.
My bliss not Earth in her ring could hold,
Nor Night, that doth all the stars enfold.

It clothes me and bathes me round:

I find no end nor measure.

I sink, I am lost; drowned

In the wonder and depth of pleasure.

O joy of love, could I plumb with a rod the sea,

My tongue might tell the untellable sweetness of thee.

OVER THE SEA.

THERE came an evening when the storm had died After long rain, miraculously clear:
And lo, across the burning waters wide
Rose up that coast, to thee and me how dear.

I knew the very houses by the bay. And as I gazed, the time that clouded thick On those old hours, fell suddenly away, And memory was bared, even to the quick.

There was no peace then in the evening light; For all my joy was left on that far shore. Betwixt that apparition and the night Alone I was; and I was brave no more.

Could I not keep thee, even in my heart?

O, my dear love, we perish, when we part.

LAMENT.

O could the fallen leaf
On the bough again be born,
The old joy, the old grief
Come fresh to the heart with morn!
Spring will bring new flowers
And morning a new song:
But I want not these, I long
For the old days, the old hours.

The kisses that I kissed,
The sweet kisses you gave,
All are gone in a mist,
Gone into Time their grave.
Could I once again
Feel that old first kiss,
This, and only this
Could heal my wound of pain.

SEPARATION.

WE parted at golden dawn.

I feasted my last on her eyes,
And journeyed, journeyed alone:
Mountains and cities and skies

Hurried with cruel pace, Endless and swift as the years, From the light, from the sun, from her face, My heart full of darkness and tears.

In a day, in a night have flown Ages on ages fleet. At dawn I wander alone In a strange, in a silent street.

O love, far off in the clime Of our joy, remember, and bend From that early glory of Time To me at his desolate end.

FEARS OF LOVE.

Love grasps my heart in a net
Like the strong roots of a flower;
So surely his root is set
In my spirit, to hold me with power.
Yet to-night, O forgive me, Dear!
I am troubled, my heart trembles.
There flutters within me a fear
That Love in vain dissembles.

O is it that even our trust,
So strongly planted,
How steadfast soever, must
By its own fear be haunted?
As the heart must beat in the breast
If the pulse to its life be true,
Love must tremble and throb in his nest
To be sure of his life-blood anew?

IN THE FIRELIGHT.

So sad and so lonely, Dear?

What dream by the fire do you dream
So deep, that you could not hear
My step as I entered? Dim
Is the room and the ceiling above you
With shadows that leap from the fire:
But hither, look hither, 'tis I
That am here; it is I, that love you.
I am come on the wings of desire:
Far off, I felt you sigh.

How could my heart refuse
Your longing that pierced so far?
That in those clear eyes, that muse,
Has kindled a mournful star?
But now, O now no longer
In the fire your comfort seek.
I bring love brighter than flame,
Than the sunshine warmer and stronger.
I cherish your hands; O speak,
Look on me, and speak my name!

THE ELM.

O THAT I had a tongue, that could express Half of that peace thou ownest, darkling Tree! A slumber, shaded with the heaviness That droops thy leaves, hangs deeply over me.

Far off, the evening light
Takes dim farewell: with hesitating Night
Day softly parleys; each her hour suspends,
Hushing the harboured winds, lest they affright
Ripe summer, that the falling leaf attends.

Fresh are the fields; and like a bloom they wear This delicate evening. Peace upon them lies So soft, I marvel that their slopes to air Dissolve not, ere foot reach them: dewy skies

In dream the distance steep.
Thou only, solitary Elm, dost keep
Firm root in earth, and with thy musing crest
Unmoved, and darkly branching arms asleep,
As truth in dream, my spirit anchorest.

O surely Sleep inhabits in thy boughs,
Sleep, that knows all things; each well-hid distress
And private sigh; that all men's plea allows,
And is acquainted with the happiness
Removed, of him that grieves.

Surely beneath thy grave and tranquil leaves He will unfold the obstinate mystery That to our questing thought for ever cleaves, And I may hold in my own hand the key.

To pierce the veil, and, seeing with clear eyes, Wonder that riddles ever vext our lot, What joy! For did perfidious Earth devise Our desolation; were her felon plot

To flatter with fair shows,
That we her purpose out of useless woes
Might fashion, baited by a glorious lure,
You could not, O dark leaves, such deep repose
Imitate, nor conspire to seem secure.

You, as a child exclaims the natural fear Which men dissemble, what you could not hide Would utter: but you sleep, remete from care. Still tree, by thy dumb augury I abide

Nor further ask thee tell
Things for the time imprisoned: I the spell
Might break, and thou the rash intruder scorn.
Enough, that what I know not thou know'st well,
Unagitated, nor hast need to mourn.

THE VISION OF AUGUSTINE AND MONICA.

MOTHER, because thine eyes are sealed in sleep, And thy cheeks pale, and thy lips cold, and deep In silence plunged, so fathomlessly still Thou liest, and relaxest all thy will, Is it indeed thy spirit that is flown? And gazing on thy face, am I alone? O wake and tell me it is false: I fear: And yet my heart persuades me thou art near With living love. I cannot weep nor wail. Nor feel thee taken from me; the tears fail Within me, and my lips their moan reject. Nay, as I watch, each instant I expect Thine eyes will shine upon me unaware And thy lips softly part, and to thy hair Laying one hand, like those who come from dreams So bright, that the dim morning only seems, Thou wilt stretch forth the other into mine. And to thy tender gaze thy love resign, And speak, as thou wast wont, in thy low voice Words wise and gentle, and my heart rejoice With comfort poured into a trusted ear. Mother, thou hearest? Surely thou dost hear, Though thy tired eyes, blissfully closed, defer

The heavy world, the weight of human lot.

A change has fallen, and yet I know not what.

The deep communion of thy calm enfolds

My spirit also, and suspended holds

Lament, that knows not why to weep, yet yearns

For something missed, a fear it dimly learns.

And yet time has not touched us: the full glow Salutes us, even as when five eves ago, By this same window, over the same seas, With thoughts of home brought by the shadow breeze From regions dearer than these golden skies, We looked, and the same glory filled our eyes. Even so the sun transfiguring the land Upon the outstretched waters and bright sand Reclined: the same faint odours floated sweet From the green garden flowering at our feet. Silent we gazed, and the serene large air Appeased our thoughts; the burden that they bare Departed: marvelling at our own release We greeted wave and ray as kindred. Peace Descended then, and touched us; and we knew Our joy, attired in light, and felt it true. Dust of the journey, the hot din of Rome Fell from us: with an aspect kind, like home, The silent and interminable sea Our longing matched with his immensity: We followed the far sails that, one by one, Were drawn into the huge and burning sun; And our souls set to freedom; and they cast

Away the soiled remembrance of things past, And to the things before, with radiant speed, Ran on in joy, eager as captives freed, Far to the last horizon's utmost bound, Onward and onward, and no limit found.

Then thou rememberest how regarding long This lovely earth, an inward vision strong O'ercame us, till terrestrial beauty took An insubstantial seeming, the far look Of regions known in dream. Forsaking fear We rose together to that ampler sphere, Where the sun burns, and in his train the moon And myriad stars upon the darkness strewn Illumine earth: on splendour past access Of fleshly eye, revolving weariless, We gazed; yet even as we gazed, the pang Of the eternal touched us: then we sprang From those bright circles, and each boundary passed Of sense, and into liberty at last, To our own souls we came, the haunted place Of thought, companionless as ancient space, Her lonely mirror; and uplifted thence Sighed upward to the eternal Effluence Of life, the intense glory that imbues With far-off sheddings of its radiant hues Mortality; that from the trees calls forth Young leaves, and flowers from the untended earth; And from the heart of man, joy and despair, Rapture and adoration, the dim prayer

Of troubled lips, tears and ecstatic throes, And fearful love unfolding like the rose, And hymps of peace: whose everlasting power Draws up ten thousand spirits every hour, As the bright vapour from ten thousand streams. Back to their home of homes, where thou with beams Of living joy, O Sun of humankind, Feedest the fainting and world-wounded mind, And from remembrance burnest out all fear. Sustained a moment in that self-same sphere By wings of ecstasy, we hung, we drew Into our trembling souls the very hue Of Paradise, permitted the dear breath Of truth; us also ignorance of death Made mighty, and joy beyond the need of peace. We of the certain light of blessedness A moment tasted: then, since even desire Perishes of its own exceeding fife, Sighing our spirits failed, and fell away, And sank into the tinge of alien day Unwillingly, to memory and the weight Of hope on the unsure heart, to armed fate, And prisoning time, and to the obscuring sound Of human words, O even to the ground!

The flame that fledged to that remotest height Our spirits winged upon impassioned flight, Sped us no more; but yet the usurping press Of mortal hours their wonted heaviness Relaxed, and on our rapture lightly leaned.

Now, as we gazed, a glory intervened:
We saw, yet saw not: our thoughts lingered, where
The rays yet pierced them of celestial air;
And with hearts hushed, as children that have learned
The meaning of some fear or joy, we turned
To one another, and spoke softly, and drew
Sighs, when that light smote on our thoughts anew.

O could the tumult of the senses sleep, We murmured then: the mutinous body keep Due pace, and this surrounding bath of light, And these unwearying waves of day and night, Following in beauty, the bright death and birth Of suns, the sweet apparel of the earth, Awhile be dimmed: could but the moon forego Her splendour, and the winds forget to blow, Ocean no more his troubling water heave, And air its many-coloured web unweave, Could but those visions pale that with affright Pierce us, or unapproachable delight, And all disturbing charm that at our eyes Darts arrows, and for ever laughs and flies; Could all be hushed, and memory turn her face, And hope her low flute silence for a space, And the soul slip the clinging leash of thought, And cast the raiment she herself hath wrought, And, as a flower springs upward unaware, Naked ascend into the eternal air: While he, who all this lovely warp of earth With pomp of time inweaves, and still from birth Moves his creation to death's other door,
If he through perishable mouths no more
Should speak: not dimly through the veil of sense
Reported, nor conjectured influence
Of stars, nor through the thunder, nor by dream,
Nor by whatever of prophetic theme
Angel or man melodiously hath sung,
But utter very words of his own tongue,
And hold communion with the mind he made,
As with the light such things as know not shade,
O were not this the joy of joy to win,
And Paradise indeed to enter in?

I too, I too, in my own feverish youth That light desired; and fainted after truth, Unripe in fervour: in a misty morn Of passion and unrestful ferment borne Hither and thither, many uncertain flames Did I pursue, and stumbled among shames, And wandered where my own rash spirit drove, Misleading to sad joys. In love with Love, I looked in many faces, searching him, And passionately embraced with phantoms dim, Nor knew what my heart hungered for. But thou, Who understandest, who beginnest now In glory visible to fill mine eyes, Thou that obscure desire didst authorise, And by degrees unto itself disclose. O by that beam how momentary shows The world: 'tis but the bush that burns with thee:

And I the sandals of mortality

Long to put off, and with these chains have done,

That bind me, and fly homeward to the sun.

Mother, but thou? O what a pang is this That wounds me? Mother, of what cup of bliss Hast thou partaken, that I may not taste? O could I penetrate thy peace, and haste Thither where thou art gone! O now in vain My heart swells with unconquerable pain. My desolation now too well I know. I cannot come where my soul chafes to go, But lay my wet cheek down to thine, and feel Thy cold cheek desolate my heart, and steal Peace and delight away. Dost thou not move, Thou that wert used to weep sad tears of love For me that grieved thee? Now thou weep'st no more, But I with all the hurtoI caused thee sore, Weep all thy tears afresh. The door is closed Upon me fast, and darkness interposed! Now terrible thy calm seems, and this peace Of night dismays me, longing for release That will not visit me. On earth and skies The hush of slumber falls, on thy closed eyes, My mother, on the shore and on the sea; All things the night appeases, but not me.

THE PINE WOODS OF GRIJÓ.

Our voices break on a stillness bright and strange Of early morning. Pines upon either hand People the sunshine: deep as eye can range, Their lofty throngs in a darkling order stand.

Our sandy path, new-washed with rains of night, Already is dry: but dewily shine its banks. And cool, the shadows asleep upon stems upright, Unevenly dapple the silent, endless ranks.

The shadows, they lie so lightly, I think if a wind Blew hither, his breath would lift them, as all sad cares Are lifted, blown from the cleared and eager mind, That now unbidden its native pleasure dares.

O pines of ardent branches, that plume with green The delicate blue of morning, and softly house The warm light poured from a splendour half unseen; O forest still and scented, hear my vows!

My body is warm to my heart, and I rejoice. I clothe myself with the light, as ye are clade. As ye breathe forth your perfume, I my voice Will utter in morning freshness, alert and glad.

138 THE PINE WOODS OF GRIJÓ.

As the thistledown melts in the air, of very lightness, Is scattered the web that trouble has vainly spun; And my spirit arising bold, and bathed in brightness, Hymns the excellent, sweet, victorious sun.

CARVALHOS.

EARTH, I love thee well;
And well dost thou requite me.
I have no tongue to tell
How this day thou hast thrilled
With wonder, to delight me,
My heart, intensely stilled.

On the white-walled knoll I stand And feel beneath me glowing The noon-hushed, lovely land: Hills beyond hills, and few Far towns a faint crest showing Faint in the rounding blue.

Blue sea and radiant sky,
Blue sky and mountain marry;
And the mind, raised up on high,
Onward and onward springs;
Where'er she choose to tarry,
On every side are wings.

To the sun the sun-bathed pines Their strength and sweetness render. From where the far foam shines Like the rim of a dazzling shield, All fervent things and tender Life, joy, and perfume yield.

Me, too, with mastering charm From husks of dead days freeing, The sun draws up, to be warm And to bloom in this sweet hour; The stem of all my being Waited to bear this flower.

Upward, a burning flame, My spirit springs enkindled. No more of place, nor name, Nor time aware, it flees Aloft, in the noon to be mingled, In fire its fife to appease.

DOURO.

THE dripping of the boughs in silence heard Softly; the low note of some lingering bird Amid the weeping vapour; the chill fall Of solitary evening upon all That stirs and hopes and apprehends and grieves, With pining odours of the ruined leaves Have like a dew distilled upon my heart The air of death: but now recoiling start Longing and keen remembrance out of sighs; And forward the desiring spirit flies Toward the wild peace of that illumined shore, Which, left behind her, yet still shines before; To Douro, rushing through the mighty hills. Now his great stream with fancied splendour fills Even this brooding twilight; a swift ghost, Journeying forever to the glimmering coast, Where his majestic voice is heard afar, Exulting dim upon that ocean bar. O Douro, gliding by dark woods, and fleet Beneath thy shadowy rocks in the noon heat, How my heart faints to follow after thee On one true course to my deep destined sea! To take no care of dimness or sunshine,

Urged ever by an inward way divine,
Nor falter in this heavy gloom that brings
So thick upon me lamentable things
Of earth, and hinders the swift spirit's wings,
And clouds the steadfast vision that sustains
Alone the trembling heart amid perpetual pains.

Dear friend, who thirstest, even as I, to be Heir and possessor of sweet liberty, Once more in memory let us pluck the hour That bloomed so perfect, and renew the power Of joy within our wondering breasts, to feel That freshness of eternal things, and heal All our unhappy thoughts in those pure rays. Not yet the last of these delightful days Into the dark unwillingly has flown, And thou and I upon a hill o'ergrown, That indolently shadows Douro stream, Together watch the wonderful clear dream Of evening. Under the dark shore of pines Noiselessly running, the wide water shines. Curving afar, from where the mountains lift Their burning heads, through many a forest rift The River comes, scenting the spaces free In this broad channel, of his welcoming sea. No more by silent precipices hewn Out of the night, marmuring a lonely tune To craggy Fregeneda; nor where shines Regoa, throned among her purple vines, Impetuously seeking valleys new;

But smoothing his broad mirror to the hue And peace of heaven, unhasting now he flows And with the sky unfathomably glows, Even as on yonder shore the woods receive In their empurpled bosoms the warm eve. As when a lover gazes tenderly Upon his loved one, and, as tender, she Hushes her heart, her joy to realize, So hushed, so lovely, so contented lies Earth, by that earnest-gazing glory blest. But on this hither bank that fervent West Is hidden behind us, and the stems around Spring shadowy from the bare and darkling ground. Only a single pine out of the shade Emerges, in what splendour soft arrayed! Magical clearness, warming to the sight As to the touch it would be: plumed with light, Motionless upward the tree soars and burns. But now the dews upon the freshened ferns In the dim hollow gather, and cool scent Of herbage with the pine's pure odour blent, And voices of the villagers below As home, with music, up the stream they row, Greet us descending; every blossom sleeps, And bluer and more blue the evening steeps Water and fragrant grass and the straight stems In tender myster. Down a path that hems The hollow to our waiting boat we come. Pale purple flames shining amid the gloom Signal the autumn crocus: look, afar,

Betwixt the tree-tops, the first-ventured star! Soon gliding homeward under shadowy shores And deepened sky, to the repeated oars' Strong chime we hasten. Now along pale sand Our ripple leaps in silver; now the land, High over the swift water darkly massed, Echoes our falling blades as we go past; Until, enthroned upon her hills divine, The city nears us: lights begin to shine Scarce from the stars distinguished, so the gloom Has mingled earth and sky; more steeply loom The banks on either side, at intervals Tufted with trees, or crowned with winding walls; And now at last the river opens large, Filled with the city's murmur; from his marge, Slope over slope, the glimmering terraces Rise, and their scattered lamps' bright images Cast on the wavering water; and we hear The sound of soft bells, and cries faint or near From the dim wharves, or anchored ships, whose spars Entangle in dark meshes the white stars. And pale smoke rising blue on the blue air Sleeps in a thin cloud under heights that bear Towers and roofs lofty against the west, Where yet a clearness lingers. Now the breast Of Douro heaves, foreboding whither bound His currents hasten, and with joyous sound, As though the encountering brine new purses gave, Lifts, to outrace our speed, his buoyant wave.

For, hearken, up the peaceful evening borne Out of the wide sea-gates, low thunders warn Of Ocean beating with his sleepless surge Along the wild sand-marges: the deep dirge Of mariners, that wakes the widow's ear At night, far inland, terrible and near. Fainter, this eve, he murmurs than as oft His troubled music: here, by distance soft, The abrupt volley, the sharp shattering roar, And seethe of foam flung tumbling up the shore, Mingle in one wide rumour, that all round Is heard afar, robing the air with sound. Deep in my heart I hear it. The still night Deepens, as we ascend the homeward height, And loud or low, in following intervals, Over the hills the sound unwearied falls; And as upon my bed my heavy eyes Close up, the drowsing mind reloccupies.

O what a vision floats into my sleep!

As a night-shutting flower, my senses keep
The live day's lingering odours and warm hues,
That thought and motion with themselves transfuse,
Till sound and light and perfume are but one,
Mingled in fires of the embracing sun.
Yet still I am aware of Ocean stirred
Far off, and like a grave rejoicing heard.
Am I awake, or in consenting dreams
Pour thither all my thought's tumultuous streams?
His voice, to meet them, a deep answer sends:

My soul, to listen, her light wing suspends, And, pillowed upon undulating sound, For all desire hath satisfaction found. He calls her thither, where the winds uncage Vast longing, that the unsounded seas assuage. Breeze after breeze her wingèd pinnace bears Over the living water, that prepares Still widening mystery: she her speed the more Urges, exulting to have lost the shore, Supported by the joy that sets her free, Delighted mistress of her destiny, Fills the wide night with beating of her wing, And is content, for ever voyaging By timeless courses, over worlds unknown, Lifted and lost, abounding and alone.

NATURE.

BECAUSE out of corruption burns the rose, And to corruption lovely cheeks descend; Because with her right hand she heals the woes Her left hand wrought, loth nor to wound nor mend;

I praise indifferent Nature, affable
To all philosophies, of each unknown;
Though in my listening ear she leans to tell
Some private word, as if for me alone.

Still, like an artist, she her meaning hides, Silent, while thousand tongues proclaim it clear; Ungrudging, her large feast for all provides; Tender, exultant, savage, blithe, austere,

In each man's hand she sets its proper tool, For the wise, wisdom, folly for the fool. CMISWICK PRESS:—CHARLES WHITTINGHAM AND CO.
TOOKS COURT, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON.

A List of Mr. Grant RICHARDS'S Publications in Belles Lettres.

WALTER LEAF.

Versions from the Divan of Hafiz. Pott 4to.

LAURENCE BINYON.

Porphyrion and Other Poems. Fcap. 8vo. Cloth, 5s.

ALICE MEYNELL.

'The Flower of the Mind: A Choice among the best Poems. With cover designed by Laurence Housman. Crown 8vo. Buckram, 6s.

RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam: A Paraphrase from several Literal Translations. Long Fcap. 8vo. Parchement cover, 5s.

MAURICE MAETERLINCK.

Aglavaine and Selysette: A Drama in Five Ass.

Translated into English by Alfred Sutro. With an Introduction by J. W. Makail, and a title-page designed by W. H. Margetson. Globe 8vo. Half buckram, 2s. 6d. net.

EDWARD VERRALL LUCAS.

A Book of Verses for Children. With cover, title-page, and 4-papers designed in colours by F. D. Bedford. Crown 8vo. Cloth, 6. Third Edition.

LAURENCE ALMA TADEMA.

Realms of Unknown Kings: Poems. Fcap. 8vo. Paper, covers, 2s. net; buckram, 3s. net.

ARABELLA AND LOUISA SHORE. Poems by A. and L. Crown 8vo. Cloth, 5s. net.

LOUISA SHORE.

Hannibal: A Poetical Drama in Two Parts. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. Cloth, 5s. net. New edition.

MRS. LEAKE.

The Ethics of Browning's Poems. With an Introduction by the Bishop of Winchester. Fcap. 8vo. Gloth, 25. 64.

W. I. STILLMAN.

The Old Rome and the New and Other Studies. Crown 8vo. Cloth, 5s.

EUGENE LEE-HAMILTON.

The Inferno of Dante translated into English Verse. Fcap. 8vo. Cloth, 5s. net.

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

Plays, Pleasant and Unpleasant. With Portrait, Special Introductions, and Preface to each Play. 2 vols. Fcap. 8vo. Cloth, 5s. each.

VERNON LEE.

Limbo and Other Essays. With Frontispiece. Fcap. 8vo. Buckram, 5s. net.

WILL ROTHENSTEIN.

English Portraits: A Series of Lithographed Drawings. In twelve parts, in wrapper designed by the artist. Folio. 2s. 6d. each net.

Portraits have already appeared of: Mr. Thomas Hardy. Mr. W:!!!

Sir Frederick Pollock. Sir F. Seymour Haden. The Rt. Rev. Dr. Creighton. The Acarchioness of Granby. Rt. Hon. W. E. H. Lecky, M.P. Mr. John Sargent. Mr. A. W. Pinero. Miss Ellen Terry. Professor A. Legros. Professor Charles Villiers Mr. George Bernara Stanford. Mrs. Meynell.

Mr. W. E. Henley. Mr. Sidney Colvin. Mr. Rovert Bridges.

Mr William Archer.

Mr. Charles Ricketts. Mr. Charles Hazelwood Shannon, etc.

In April these twelve parts will appear in one volume, with a Preface and a specially designed cover by Mr. Rothenstein. Folio. Buckram, 35s. net.